through the world's finan-cial markets yesterday as traditional ally. Diplomats emphasised that the dispute cial markets yesterday as President Mubarak of Egypt launched a whistlestop peace mission to avert a desert war between Iraq and its tiny neighbour, Kuwait.

America, which has seven warships on exercise in the Gulf, expressed concern as 30,000 Iraqi troops moved towards the border after a week-long dispute over oil production and territorial claims.

Marlin Fitzwater, the White House spokesman, said: columns were equipped with build-up. It is a delicate situation. We urge all parties to avoid violence." Officials said American forces in the region had not been put on special alert, but the shortnotice exercise with ships from the United Arab Emirates was clearly timed to show support for allies in the Gulf.

"Iraq and others know there is no place for coercion and intimidation in a civilised world," Margaret Tutwiler of the State Department said. We remain determined to defend the principle of freedom of navigation and to ensure the free flow of oil through the Strait of Hormuz. We also remain strongly committed to supporting the individual and collective selfdefence of our friends in the Gulf." Asked if Kuwait was a friend, she replied "yes".

Oil prices rose yesterday on the news of the rising tension, with Brent crude for August delivery increasing by 40 cents to $19.30 a barrel. Speculation mounted that prices could rapidly rise to about $21. Oil company shares responded with small gains, BP rising 7p to 340p. Commons to hear defence changes

By MICHAEL EVANS, DEFENCE CORRESPONDENT

THE cabinet is likely today to ministry's paper on the opapprove recommendations for restructuring the armed forces over the next 10 years under proposals by the defence ministry's "options for change" review team. If the cabinet gives the go-ahead, Tom King, the defence secretary, will make a statement to the Commons this afternoon.

Officials last night emphasised that Mr King was in no position yet to produce a blueprint for the services. But MPs will be given a clear indication of the proposed size and structure of the three armed forces. The full implications of the review, will not be worked out for some months.

Yesterday the cabinet overseas and defence committee, chaired by Margaret Thatcher, met to discuss the defence tions for change and approved the main proposals. The only absent member was Douglas Hurd, the foreign secretary, who is abroad.

Mr King's statement is expected to emphasise that the changes in British forces will only be carried out after full consultation with the allies and after the impact of a Conventional Forces in Europe (CFE) agreement has been taken into account. He is not expected to announce the size of any peace dividend.

If he makes a statement, it will coincide with an announcement on measures to be taken to save £600 million from this year's defence bud-get because of higher than expected inflation.

Labour to cut union power in selections

By PHILIP WEBSTER CHIEFPOLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

THE Labour party is expected today to end the nine-year-old system under which all its MPs automatically have to face reselection by their local parties in every parliament. At the same time the local trade union block vote in selection contests is to be replaced by a one member one vote system in which MPs and candidates are chosen by a ballot of all local party members.

The ruling national executive committee will also set in hand a study of radical longer term proposals to widen the selection franchise further by involving Britain's four million trade unionists who pay a political levy to the

Labour party. This latest instalment of Neil Kinnock's campaign to bring greater democracy into Labour affairs will be accompanied by a second organiational purge in Liverpool to block the renewed threat of the Militant Tendency and the outlawing of a Trotskyjst group known as Socialist Organiser. Van Gogh's ear goes under the microscope

Self-portrait of the artist with severed ear

From Charles Bremner

A COMMON hearing disorder drove Vincent Van Gogh to lop off his ear and later kill himself, according to US medical experts, who say the evidence proves that the artist was neither psychotic nor epileptic. If only the painter had received the simple treatment available today, he could have gone on to "lead a full productive life," says the report in the Journal of the American Medical Association.

In 1889 Van Gogh admitted himself to the asylum at St Remy, southern France, where he was diagnosed as suffering from epilepsy and acute mania with visual and aural hallucinations. He committed suicide on July 29, 1890 at the age of 37.

Dr Kaufman Arenberg, of the Swedish Medical Centre in Denver, Colorado, said his team had diagnosed the painter's ailment as Meniere's disease, a condition characterised by a painful ringing or buzzing in the ear, acute dizziness and extreme sensitivity to noise. It was first identified in France in 1861 but word had not reached the doctors in Provence.

The Colorado research is the latest attempt by experts to dismantle the image of the mad genius. Other theories have ascribed his symptoms to venereal disease and a vision disorder. For two years before entering the hospital, Van Gogh had complained about attacks of vertigo and bouts of a roaring sound and voices. At one stage he said he had to flee Paris because the noise was too painful. When he cut off part of his left ear and sent it to a prostitute just before Christmas in 1888 he told a doctor in Arles, that he had been assailed by auditory hallucinations. The incident suggests that the tinnitus characteristic of Meniere's had become intolerable and that he felt he might alleviate the hallucinations by eliminating their source, the study says. The disease causes intense suffering for short periods and other victims have severed their ears or punctured them with ice picks to end the noise.

Dr Arenberg said he had first rec-ognised Van Gogh's symptoms while attending an art history class as a student. A friend had suffered a similar ailment. An examination of 796 of Van Gogh's letters revealed "a man constantly in control of his reason and suffering from severe repeated attacks of disabling vertigo, not a seizure disorder Meniere's disease, which was often wrongly diagnosed as epilepsy well into this century, can now be cured with surgery or changes in diet.

Queen's civil list set for a decade

By ALAN HAMILTON

TIGHTER management of the royal family's finances is the intention of an announcement by the prime minister yesterday that the Queen's civil list would henceforth be set every ten years. Bucking-ham Palace has appointed a leading accountant to take charge of its financial affairs.

in a Commons statement Mrs Thatcher said that the Oueen's civil list, which pays the working expenses and staff salaries of the monarchy, would be fixed at an average of £7.9 million a year for the next decade, and that during that period cost savings of £5 million were expected. The arrangement returns royal finances to the system which prevailed before 1975, when rampant inflation forced an annual review, with the potential political embarrassment of the Queen's expenses being trailed before MPs every bud-

Announcing the measure to MPs, Mrs Thatcher said it was both appropriate for the dignity of the Crown and in tune with responsible financial management". Labour MPs attacked the proposed sums as excessive, although Neil Kinnock welcomed the move as serving the purposes of good management.

Michael Peat, a partner in the accountancy firm Peat Marwick McLintock, has been appointed director of finance and property services, a new post within the royal household. One of his key responsibilities will be to take over the running of Buckingham and St James's palace and Windsor Castle, current? in the care of the Departmer of the Environment and i soon-to-be-privatised main; nance wing, the Property Se. vices Agency.

- Under the government's proposals, the Queen's grant will be set at £5.9 million for 1991, compared with just over £5 million for this year, and will rise by an average of a compound 7.5 per cent each year to reach £10.4 million by the year 2000. The avera amount for each of the next ten years will be £7.9 million. In March of this year the civil list was increased by 9 per cent, to keep pace with inflation. The government's target for the next decade, taking into account cost-cutting, is a real annual increase of 6.6 per cent, a considerable squeeze when the present rate of inflation is considered.

THE High Court in Dublin yesterday began hearing an extra-dition case that could have explosive implications for Anglo-Irish relations and the British government's hopes for political progress in Northern Ireland.

The Desmond Ellis case is the first to be heard in the republic under the new 1987 Extradition Act, which is based on the European Convention on the suppression of terrorism.

In the wake of recent decisions by the Irish Supreme Court under the old legislation, which revived the political defence for convicted or suspected IRA members and which severely strained relations with Britain, the case will be closely watched in London and Belfast to see if the new act is an

The new legislation has already aroused controversy in the republic and is the focus of continuing concern among British officials. While it seeks to simplify procedure and make extradition automatic for most terrorism-related offences, it contains many loop-holes and is believed by Dublin extradition lawyers to be badly drafted and open to conflicting The act's main shortcoming is that it still allows IRA defendants to argue that their offences were political thus possibly saving them from extradition, if the offences involve the use of non-automatic firearms or the possession, rather than the use, of explosives.

This could allow a member of an IRA unit arrested in the Republic and wanted in Northern Ireland to resist extradition if he shot a policeman with a revolver as opposed to an AK47 assault rifle.

In recent months, as these and other shortcomings have become obvious, opposition politicians have campaigned to force tharles Haughey, the prime minister, to amend the law.

Alan Dukes, leader of the main opposition party Fine Gael, has called for an all-party summit to discuss the closure of loopholes and to prevent, in a phrase borrowed from Margaret Thatcher, the republic becoming a safe haven

More embarrassing for Mr Haughey has been pressure from his junior coalition partners, the Progressive Democrats. During the party's annual conference in May, Des O'Malley, the leader, said it was nauscating and immoral to all decent people that IRA suspects should have any chance of a political defence.

Mr Haughey has refused to give way. He says that the 1987 act will make extradition easier and wants it tested before the courts.

However, even if Mr Haughey had amended the law quickly, it would have been too late to affect the Ellis case. But if Mr Ellis's extradition fails on grounds directly related to the shortcomings of the present act, a serious Anglo-Irish dispute is expected. The British government will argue that obvious weaknesses in the new law had been foreseen, had now been laid bare before the court, and that Mr Hanghey had deliberately and publicly failed to respond.

Worst of all is the possibility that a deferred High Court judgment in the autumn on the Ellis case and a subsequent ruling in his favour by the Supreme Court could so incense unionists that they feel unable to support negotiations with Dublin on a new Anglo-Irish agreement. The talks are expected to start in October.

Mr Haughey's intransigence re-flects the enormous political cap-

IRA London bomb campaign necessary, court told

IRA bombings in London were an integral and necessary part of the campaign to end British rule in Northern Ireland, the High Court in Dublin was told yesterday (Edward Gorman

The claim was made in an affidavit by Desmond Ellis, who is fighting extradition to Britain over bombings in which three people were killed. Mr Ellis, aged 37, from Finglas in Dublin, is wanted on charges that he had explosive substances with intent to endanger life between 1981 and 1983 and that he conspired to cause explosions.

The charges relate to IRA bombings at Chelsea barracks, in which two people were killed; in Oxford Street, where an army bomb

Michael Havers, the former Attorney-General. The case is the first under the republic's 1987 extradition act and if Mr Ellis is extradited, he will be the first alleged IRA man to be sent by the Irish courts to face trial in Britain.

Mr Ellis told the court yesterday that he had been in custody in Ireland and the United States when the bombings took place. He also said in an affidavit that the offences for which he is wanted were political and that he should not. therefore, be extradited.

Mr Ellis was first arrested and charged with explosives offences in Dublin in May 1981. The following January he jumped bail and fled to the United States. A month later, he was disposal officer died, and at the home of Sir arrested and deported to Ireland where he was subsequently tried and jailed for eight years. Shortly before completing his sentence in April last year, he was arrested on extradition warrants issued by Scotland Yard and has been in custody since, fighting the extradition order made by Dublin district court last January.

Det Sergeant Ian Macleod of Scotland Yard told the court that Mr Ellis's fingerprints were found on an IRA arms cache found in Panghourne in October 1983. He said the cache was linked to the London explosions and to Mr Ellis, whose fingerprints appeared 13 times. The hearing, which continues today, is expected to last four days with judgment being ital he has accumulated during his EC presidency and the widespread ression that despite the coalition, he can do what he likes. Few now accept his supporters' view that he would face a grassroots revolt in his party that could threaten his career if he changed the law. In the High Court, Mr Ellis's lawyers are expected to concentrate on the defence that his alleged offences were political in nature, that the incidents to which they relate were committed while he was in custody in Ireland and that he would not get a fair trial in Britain if extradited. On this point. lawyers will include arguments based on legal proceedings in Britain involving the Guildford Four, Winchester Three and Birmingham Six cases.

If the High Court approves Mr Ellis's extradition, lawyers may try to persuade the Supreme Court that their client cannot be extradited under the 1987 act because the offences were committed before 1987. The court will have to decide whether the act can apply to offences committed before its in-troduction. The defence may also say that Mr Ellis's alleged posion of explosives falls short of intent to use them and thus bars him from extradition under loop-holes in the new legislation.

Scargill seeks compromise to avoid court humiliation

By TIM JONES, EMPLOYMENT CORRESPONDENT

THE miners' leader Arthur after the leaders of 38 Scargill was last night fighting in Paris to reach a compromise over the "missing" similar stance and was made £1.4 million of Soviet money as the four members of the result save him from the that would save him from the humiliation of being taken to court by his colleagues.

Far from the British coalfields, in the unlikely setting of an airport hotel, Mr Scargill was trying to persuade four members of the National Union of Mineworkers' executive to accept a formula that would enable breach of trust actions to be dropped.

Throughout the saga, Mr Scargill has maintained that the money, deposited in bank accounts in Dublin and Vienna, controlled by the International Miners Organisation, area NUM, said that the area was intended for the use of would be holding a special miners throughout the world. But the NUM, backed by Labour MPs, is convinced the money was collected by Soviet Mr Heathfield about the and Eastern Bloc miners to Soviet money. He said it was relieve hardship suffered by inevitable that the NUM's

The meeting, which could have a crucial bearing on Mr Scargill's ability to maintain his position, was organised by the IMO, whose president, Alain Simon, along with Peter Heathfield, the NUM general secretary, were also named in the High Court writ.

Although Mr Scargill, who is also president of the IMO, affected an air of confidence, it appeared that any effort to channel money to the NUM was being resisted by M

M Simon, condemned by Gavin Lightman, QC, for his refusal to co-operate fully with his enquiry into the steward-ship of the NUM, remained defiant in his insistence that the money belonged to his secretive organisation. He said: "There is no reason to give the money back. It be-longs to the IMO. There will be no concessions. Why should there be?"

He then launched an allembracing attack on the enemies of his Yorkshire friend, who, he said, was being unjustly persecuted. The list included Margaret Thatcher, the press, the TUC, and the Labour right. M Simon claimed the NUM executive had been panicked into taking action against its president after being told that if it did not do so it too could be liable for damages.

Mr Scargill's wide smile,

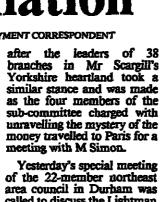

which he wore whenever he emerged from the Reims Suite, did not betray the air of a man shouldering such burdens. His arrival at the hotel was the first time he has been seen in public since flying to Paris last Saturday to meet M Simon and prepare his strategy. Even that entry into France began in farcical fashion when his attempt to fly out of Britain using an assumed name failed.

Away from the banter, bebind closed doors Mr Scargill was fighting to keep his position and to maintain the integrity of his once mighty union by seeking to prevent its dirty linen being washed publicly in court.

● Miners' leaders from the northeast coalfields yesterday rejected the decision of their union's national executive to issue writs against Mr Scargill (Peter Davenport writes).

They said that the issue of who owns the money, the NUM or the IMO, should be resolved by negotiation instead of legal action and the matter taken to a special delegate conference.

The decision came a day

area council in Durham was called to discuss the Lightman report. The meeting endorsed a decision taken the previous day by the NUM area executive and further emphasised the divisions within the union over the future of Mr Scargill. Later David Hopper, general secretary of the northeast

Breeder is cleared of threatening reputation

By ROBIN YOUNG

CLAIMS that a buildog breeder had threatened the reputation of the dog world by becoming involved in a dispute at a show were yesterday dismissed by a disciplinary hearing at the Kennel Club.

It had been alleged that the breeder, Norman Davis, threatened to kill a steward. John Story. During a scuffle, the quarrelling men had fallen off a rostrum and landed on an elderly woman who was among the 400 visitors to the indoor Bulldog Club Incorporated Championship Show at Luton on March 3.

Mr Davis, of Newark, Nottinghamshire, was accused of contravening Kennel Club rules by behaving in a discreditable manner prejudicial to the interests of the canine world in that he attacked Mr Story, an official of the show, injuring him. The complaint was brought against Mr Davis by Mr Story's wife, Margaret, the buildog club's secretary. If he had been found guilty, Mr Davis could have been reprimanded or banned from showing his dogs. Dismissing the case, the disciplinary subcommittee in London ordered the Bulldog Club Incorporated to pay him costs of £750.

Prince criticises doctors for not using alternative forms of medicine

By JILL SHERMAN, SOCIAL SERVICES CORRESPONDENT

THE Prince of Wales yes-terday criticised the medical profession for refusing to recognise the value of alternative medicine and called on GPs to work much more closely with complementary practitioners.

Addressing a conference held by the Royal College of General Practitioners in London the prince pointed to a number of recent studies that had shown that back pain could get better more quickly if treated by chiropractic and hay fever could be improved through homeopathic treat-

"But I have to say that even some of these highly reputable studies do not always seem to convince you," he said. "I do think it is sad, and frequently counterproductive in the long run, that professional bodies feel it necessary to be quite so defensive. Could you not learn to be less mistrustful of complementary medicine and to work with the best and most reliable therapists?"

Speaking on a pre-recorded video shown at the conference the prince assured GPs that he was neither against orthodox medicine nor advocating a charter for "every quack and charlatan" to mislead the general public. He explained that he had been unable to attend the conference because of his broken arm and said he had been only too conscious of the benefits of anaesthetics, surgical skills and painkilling drugs. "However what I am in favour of is the harnessing of the best aspects of ancient and modern medicine to contribute towards the most effective healing of the patient's mind and body.'

He emphasised that it was essential that other methods of treatment were properly evaluated before being let loose on the public. The GP should always be the gatekeeper to ensure that the therapists were genuine, reliable, known to him or her and had had recognised training.

The prince went on to highlight the specific problems facing GPs and their patients in inner cities - the theme for the college's conference. "Many people in the heart of our cities must feel a sense of helplessness, hopelessness and, indeed, loneliness, which can only be a fertile ground for all sorts of distress."

In addition, the buildings and premises from which GPs practised were often less than suitable, he said. "How can you offer care and compassion to the 2,000 or so patients attached to your practice when some of you work from premises which should have been condemned decades ago?"

Earlier GPs claimed that the health of homeless families had suffered as a direct result of conflicting government policies. Dr Richard Stone, a west London GP said that although doctors had been urged to provide more preventive medicine other departments, such as the environment department, were creating more and more homeless families every year and pushing people into the unhealthy environment of bed and breakfasts.

Ambulance services fail to meet deadlines

AMBULANCES respond to emergencies too slowly because of congested roads and poor communications, according to a report published yesterday (Jill Sherman writes). Three-quarters of metropolitan ambulance services failed to arrive within the 14 minutes laid down by the health department, and half did not even set out on

The National Audit Office report says the response times, set in 1974, may no longer be appropriate and recommends that they should be graded to allow for local conditions such as heavy traffic. "Without putting the quality of the service at risk, there may be a more appropriate classification system within which to apply the key measures for response, activation and ur-gent arrival times," the document says.

Response times varied enormously, with the worst standards found in London and central Glasgow. Nonmetropolitan areas fared better, with only six of the 50 services failing to meet the 20minute emergency target. In urgent cases, where doctors had arranged for a patient to be taken to hospital, none of the metropolitan ambulances arrived within five minutes of the promised time, and 65 per cent of the non-metropolitan services were late.

The audit office report also discloses wide variations in the cost of services and suggests that savings of more than £26 million a year could be achieved.

Britain's 58 ambulance services, which cost the health service £400 million last year, carry 25 million patients a year and employ 24,000 staff. The average cost per patient journey ranged from £10 in Oxfordshire to £46 in Cornwall and the demand for nonemergency patient journeys varied from 200 to 600 per ambulance service.

To what do we owe such journalistic acclaim? Well, let's start with the new sixteen valve engine; the heart of the Accord 2.0, 2.0i and 2.2i.

Behind each engine lies Honda's reputation as the world's leading engineers. (For confirmation, ask the Formula One journalists.) Hence generous power outputs of 112, 135 and 150 bhp respectively, come as little surprise.

What you might find more surprising is the use of double wishbone suspension linkage, fore and aft. Normally the reserve of the traditional sports car, the system gives you an unrivalled sense of control along the straights, through the chicanes and round the U-bends.

Naturally, these obstacles are encountered in the utmost comfort. Powersteering, electric door mirrors and windows are standard features across the range. (Indeed, there's nothing bog about the standard model.)

Explorer denies flight of fantasy

THE explorer Sir Ranulph Twisleton-Wykeham-Fiennes yesterday denied indulging in a flight of fantasy when he claimed that loss of sponsorship for his expeditions could be traced to 400 copies of a Canadian magazine sold in the United Kingdom.

Sir Ranulph, aged 46, said it was more than likely that he be invidious to single out any had already lost sponsorship as a result of an article in Macleans. The article posed a great danger to his chances of continuing to make a living as an explorer, he said. Sir Ranulph, of Barnes, southwest London, was being crossexamined by Richard Hartley, QC, the magazine's counsel, on the second day of his libel

Sir Ranulph said word travelled fast on the expedition grapevine. "If I want £200,000 worth of flights with Air Canada then they will contact the National Geographical Society in the UK who asks the person who has just come out of the Commonwealth library, where he read about me in Canada's national magazine. As a result the sponsor turns me down."

Mr Hartley asked: "Aren't you going off into a flight of fantasy?" Sir Ranulph: "There is nothing fanciful about what I have just said."

He claims that he was defamed by a paragraph in the article, headlined "An adventurer on the loose again", which said, "Prince Charles always supports him, claiming great results for British exports, but no one has ever been able to demonstrate that any scientific or historical benefits have resulted" from his expeditions.

Kevin Doyle, editor of Macleans, Allan Fotheringham, a journalist, and Maclean Hunter, the publishers' UK subsidiary, deny defamation.

Mr Hartley said the magazine was calling no evidence. Counsel are expected to make their closing speeches today.

THOUSANDS of airline pas-sengers have been over-airlines have filed these changes nearer the effective date," the authority's annual report said. "This would be of no great concern if there were appropriate mechanisms for refunding passengers who were overcharged. The authority has, however, been unable to get reassurance from the airlines that these mechanisms exist and it has therefore with regret introduced a requirement that all filings to increase international fares must be made at least 14 days before the proposed implementation date."

Airlines are free to set prices on domestic services but fares for international destinations must be approved at both ends of the route. The airlines claim they are sometimes unable to provide refunds if approval is denied as they cannot always obtain the names and addresses of all their passengers from local travel agents.

British Airways said it no longer sold increased fares subject to government ap-proval. "When we did sell them we made every effort to contact the passengers and give them a refund, but with the vast numbers who fly with us this may not always have been possible in every case," it

The aviation authority refused to give examples of overcharging. "We have no way of knowing exactly how many of the 90 fare rise applications that we turned down resulted in overcharging without a refund," a spokes man said. "It would therefore particular airline or route on which this was happening."

The total amount of refundable cash, although not quantified by the authority, could easily run into millions pounds. Airlines have applied for increases of at least 10 per cent on long-distance flights and return business class fares to some destinations cost more than £1,500.

Airlines flying into British airspace are facing sharply increased costs to pay for air traffic control improven that are being introduced to ease delays and congestion. The aviation authority has put up its prices by 46 per cent this year and yesterday it issued a warning that increases of at least 18 per cent will be needed next year to pay for additional staff and to help meet the £80 million that will be spent on new capital projects.

Sir Christopher Tugendhat, the authority's chairman, said: "When we had the delays and difficulties of two years ago the airlines argued strongly that they attached overwhelming importance to improving the system and if that led to increased costs, then that was a price they were prepared to

So far the improvements have had only a marginal impact on easing delays, with charter passengers seeing more benefits than scheduled passengers. In the past 12 months the average delay faced by charter passengers at Gatwick fell from 42 minutes to 36 minutes while delays to scheduled services from Heathrow increased from 18 to 19 minutes.

Vitamin claims 'mislead'

By THOMSON PRENTICE SCIENCE CORRESPONDENT

VITAMIN and mineral pills are unnecessary, and many people may be misled by false claims for them, David Maclean, food minister, said yesterday. Government dietary experts are investigating some of the claims, including that the pills can improve the intelligence of schoolchildren.

A psychologist involved in one study said yesterday that children given a multi-vitamin tablet every day for eight weeks showed an increase in intelligence. Dr David Benton, a senior lecturer at the University of Wales College, Swansea, said: "The vitamins improve attention span, so pupils tend to listen more in class and learn more."

Ninety children aged 12 were divided into three groups for the study. One group was given vitamin pills, another a placebo, and the third nothing at all. They then underwent intelligence tests, and the results were compared.

The government's scepticism is reflected in a study by the World Health Organisation, which shows that there are many useless vitamin products on the market in Europe. The organisation recommends that national policies on vitamin supplementation should emphasise that dietary improvement is the best way to meet any deficiency.

New dietary guidelines issued by the government yes-terday say: "Supplementing your diet with vitamin and mineral pills is rarely

A timeless view of the Dales from council archives

Taken two decades after the invention of photography, they are believed to be the confirm in writing that their name does not appear on the Police National Computer or, earliest landscape photoif it does, that they are suppgraphs of the area and reflect the timeless quality of its solid, stone villages and spectacular scenery. tion Registrar, who has been alarmed by the trend, said that

They were found by Janina Holubecki, a conservator with a special interest in photography who was working in the Buckinghamshire county council archives office in Aylesbury.

Miss Holubecki spent famly holidays in the Yorkshire Dales as a child. Her mother, Ann, lives near Leyburn, in Wensleydale, and is vice-chairman of Friends of the Dales Countryside Museum, based in Hawes.

The discovery came as Miss Holubecki examined a series of 50 wax paper negatives in a collection of material left to the archives by Sir John William Ramsden, who died in 1914.

One of the negatives carried the inscription "Buckden — 1861", and Miss Holubecki recognised it as Buckden village. On further examination she recognised a second view as being the church in Hubberholme. She developed the negatives and sent the 50 photographs to her mother, who identified 13 of them as being of locations in the Dales.

The photographs went on display at an exhibition in Aysgarth village hall in Wensleydale as part of an event to raise funds for the Dales Countryside Musuem.

Miss Holubecki said yesterday that what made the photographs rare, apart from their age, was that they were taken on wax paper negatives at a time when most photographers would have been using glass plate negatives.

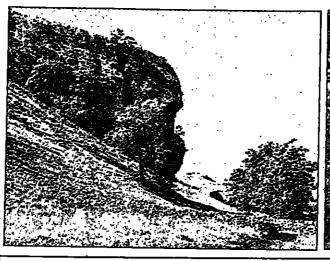

"I think they are probably the earliest landscape photographs of that area. It was a chance discovery and happened simply because I knew the area in which they had been taken so well. When I found the inscription I got very excited and it began to dawn on me why the views had seemed so familiar."

The Ramsden family owned the Raydale estate in Wensleydale and one of the photographs is of the house they used as a shooting lodge. Sir John married Lady Helen Guendolene Seymour, daughter of the 12th Duke Somerset and their main family seat at the time was at Bulstrode, near Gerrards Cross, in Buckinghamshire. It is not known which member of the family took the

'Odd man' loses £½m claim over eye injury

By LIN JENKINS

AN INTERNATIONAL trader blinded in his right eye has lost his £525,000 insurance pay-out because of claims by his insurers that the injury was self inflicted.

The Court of Appeal over turned the decision of a High Court judge to award damages on the ground that Stanley Flatman, aged 58, had failed to prove his case, but added that the insurers had not proved him guilty of fraud.

Mr Flatman, of Ipswich, Suffolk, claimed he lost the sight of his eye in an accident in the sleeper compartment of the Khyber night mail train shortly before it pulled into Lahore, Pakistan, in May 1984. He said he was sitting on the bottom bunk when he lurched forward into protrud-ing nail. He went to the Mayo hospital in Lahore, but refused to stay. Instead he went to Moorfields eye hospital in London where the eye was removed.

Both Excess Insurance and Lloyds Syndicate No 782, with whom he had insurance for accidental death and bodily injury, refused to pay the insured sums for the eye of £350,000 and £175,000 respectively, alleging that Mr Flat-man damaged the eye by inserting a sharp instrument, such as a hypodermic needle. Last year Mr Justice Macpherson ruled in the High Court that the insurers pay.

Overturning the decision yesterday, Lord Justice McCowan, sitting with Lord Justice Bingham and Sir David Croom-Johnson, said Mr Flatman was "a very odd man, with some history of psychiatric trouble, who had recently suffered domestic troubles, was in debt and was heavily insured in respect of speed rail link between the Channel tunnel, London, the regions and Scotland were unveiled by John Prescott, Labour's transport spokesman, vesterday.

The estimated 500-mile line would take ten to 20 years to complete, and could be built from new, disused and upgraded lines, financed by a public and private sector partnership, Mr Prescott said. Labour would set up an independent commission to examine its financial and environmental feasibility.

The link would run between Folkestone and the North Downs, in Kent, lalong the new rail corridor confirmed in July by Cecil Parkinson, the transport secretary, although options for bringing the trains proved by upgrading lines

PLANS for a £5 billion high- into central London would between Cardiff and Felixhave to be reviewed, Mr Prescott said.

> New track would be laid between King's Cross in London and Rugby, Warwickshire, along the route formerly used by the Great Central Line, which was closed during the era of Beeching's cuts in the 1960s but which remains

Existing electrified lines would link Rugby with Birmingham, and a new section of track could be built alongside the M6 from Birmingham to Manchester. Upgrading the Pennine route to Leeds would join the link to the east coast mainline up to Scotland, Mr Prescott said. In addition, east-west crosscountry links could be im-

The project could be financed through a combination of public money, a relaxation of the Treasury rules prohibiting British Rail from borrowing on the financial markets and private sector capital, Mr Prescott said.

The proposals are imaginative, workable and affordable. They will repair the neglect and decay of the past ten years, and give Britain a transport system matching the best in Europe," he said.

Last night, Mr Parkinson condemned the proposal as hugely expensive and hugely uneconomic. Mr Parkinson said that any attempt to allow British Rail to borrow from the finacial markets would result in huge debts and interest payments, which would have to be paid for by more taxation.

British Rail declined to comment, although last month John Prideaux, director of InterCity, said investment programmes would soon result in speeds of 155mph and 140mph on the west and east coast mainlines. A combined rail-road distribution service, designed to reduce road congestion and improve goods distribution times, was unveiled by Roger Freeman, the transport minister. The new service, known as Charterail, will use the latest swapbody technology, which enables goods to travel by rail and road in the same

DEFENCE CORRESPONDENT THE Commons defence committee is to urge the government today to abandon any idea of giving an ex-panded role to the armed forces for ealing with potential conflicts out of the Nato area. It will also warn it against maintaining too large a military presence in Germany. defence ministry has examined out-of-area capabilities, the committee has concluded: "There is nothing in the logic of events to justify an expanded role for United Kingdom forces in the wider world". The MPs accept that there will be circumstances in which Britain will want to be able to act alone or with some or all of its European partners outside Europe. However, they concluded that those circumstances would be exceptional and would hardly justify personnel and equip-ment exclusively dedicated to them.

Looking at out-of-area challenges, the committee warns the government that "it is essential to distinguish between those international problems which are amenable to military solutions and those which require political ones".

The report emphasises the importance of subjecting every procure-ment project to a rigorous review of its relevance in the emerging security scenario so that decisions based upon the circumstances of the 1980s do not DEFENCE COMMITTEE

The forces in Berlin would also stay for some time but the defence ministry must as-sume their eventual withdrawal.

However, the MPs add a warning however, the MPs and a warning note. "The growing consensus that some sort of continuing British military presence in Germany on a reduced scale may make good political sense must not lead to the nature and scale of the forces deployed making bad military enter?"

Blind people to be enabled to follow TV

NEARLY two million blind or partly blind people are likely to be found new ways of following television programmes.

Viscount Ullswater, for the government, announced during the committee stage of the Broadcasting bill that ministers wanted to consider how a million blind and 700,000 partly blind people could be given more help to enjoy television screens through audio descrip-tion or other techniques.

He said he could not accept an amendment to reserve frequency space on the commercial channels 3,4 and 5 because of technical and other flaws. "But I certainly do accept the spirit behind these amendments which, in essence, is to promote greater access to television ser-vices to people with hearing and sight disabilities. "I would like to take away the views which have been expressed and study them most carefully and consider how we might best make a provision in the bill, giving effect to this highly commendable objective."

He is expected to bring back government proposals to the Lords during the bill's report stage in October. Cross-bench and Conservative peers supported the changes to help the blind. David Mellor, the minister in charge of the bill, has already changed the bill to require the new Channel 3 and 5 companies to have subtitling for the deaf on at least half their programmes within five years. Lord Thomson of Monifieth, the former IBA chairman and the Liberal Democrat spokesman on broadcasung, said his proposal related to new technology that could enable nearly a million blind people and 700,000 partly blind to enjoy television for the first time. The techniques being suggested were employed in some theatres in the United Kingdom and more widely in America and Australia. Blind organisations wanted the home secretary to have power to protect part of the spare frequencies for that purpose. He also believed that the Independent Television Commission, which was to replace the IBA, should conduct urgent research and development into what could be done. Techniques such as audio-description enabled blind HOUSE OF LORDS that produced a commentary on what was going on.

A second way of helping them would be through a digital daily newspaper, enabling the blind person to pick the pages he or she wanted to read.

They would no longer be so dependent on relatives and friends to read from newspapers. The space to do this did need to be protected from the forces of the market place. It would be difficult for these services to compete against commercially lucrative programmes.

Viscount Ullswater said some caution was necessary. The gov-ernment did not know when some of the technical develop ments to assist the blind would be operationally feasible or the extent to which they would be taken up.

The amendments would mean that spare capacity would be reserved for a purpose that was not yet fully realisable. That would pose a difficulty for the ITC in determing exactly how much spare capacity to hold in

 A spokeswoman for the Royal National Institute for the Blind said last night: "We are delight ed that the government is looking into it, but we are disappointed that the amendments were not agreed on the

"It is vital that visually impaired people should have this provision. We have not yet got the fully developed technology, but this is a first step. It is very important to have the space reserved."

Audio description is a commentary to help blind people to picture what is on the screen. Among the difficulties it helps blind people to overcome are unspoken punchlines and occasions when body language would leave them guessing at what was happening. The commentary can be delivered during gaps in the script to avoid confusion.

Digital daily newspapers involve feeding the information from a newspaper into a computer. Blind people can type out what they are interested in learning about and, with the help of a voice synthesiser, have it read to them. They are able to stop the voice at any point they wish and select a new subject to

The prime minister brushed aside a Labour call for her to be as diligent and vigorous in securing a showing for the film International Guerrillas, that has been seen as an attack on Salman Rushdie, as she had been in defending Mr Rushdie's right to publish Satanic Verses.

Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington, Lab) called for her to defend the right of Muslims who wanted to see that film, since Salman Rushdie had said no question of criminal libel arose. He added: "Or are we simply to have double standards."

Mrs Thatcher said that the decision to refuse the film a certificate had been taken by the British Board of Film Classification on legal advice. During a series of 90-minute debates on subjects as diverse as electoral registration and the situation in Tibet, George Rob-ertson, an Opposition foreign affairs spokesman, said: "I seriously wonder at the common sense involved in the Parlia-ment of the United Kingdom sitting in the middle of the night - adult, mature men and women - debating matters of huge consequence with all the fatigue involved in it. Mr Rooker had said that 7 per cent of those eligible to vote were not registered. That meant that two million voters were missing from the register. They could decide the outcome of the next election and future elections because next year's register would be the one on which the next review of boundaries for parliamentary constituencies would be based. Far more emphasis was being put on drawing up the poll tax list. "The compilation of the electoral register is still in the age of the quill pen", he said. Under poll tax law, people in fear of violence could have their names removed from the list open to the public, but there was no legal provision for that with the electoral register. That meant that some people might not register to vote. This could

NEW guidance on the need to act promptly in moving men-tally disordered prisoners to mental hospitals is to be issued soon, David Waddington, home secretary, announced in a series of written replies. A review of ways of preventing suicide is also nearing completion.

Mr Waddington said that the uidance on transfers emphasised the need for action to be initiated promptly, including arrangements for a consultant to make an assessment visit, when it was thought that a prisoner's transfer to hospital might be warranted.

Moscow denies killing of prisoners

From Ian Murray

THE Soviet Union yesterday denied that it was responsible for the mass murder of German prisoners after the second world war, although it admitted that there were breaches of the rules for the treatment of prisoners "which at times recalled the monstrous crimes of the fascists during the war".

More than a third of the 122,671 Germans interned in the Soviet zone of occupied Germany between 1945 and 1950 did die, the Soviet foreign ministry said in a statement prepared from archive material by Georgy Kenin, deputy director of the foreign ministry's historic diplomatic department. He said that only 756 of the prisoners were executed after being condemned by military tribunals. Most of the others who had not survived died from TB.

He insisted that "accusations of deliberate mass physical annihilation of the prisoners against the Soviet occupation authorities are not confirmed by the archives. The losses are of course upsetting, but they do, not stand any comparison with the millions of Soviet people to the CDU-East against who died without trial or investigation at the hands of the Nazis.

French grow uneasy over one Germany

From PHILIP JACOBSON IN PARIS

IT TAKES something to jerk French minds away from the beach at this time of year, but the latest opinion polls reflect a clear sense of uncase about the country's future role in a fast changing Europe. While the impact of German reunification underlies the deepest uncertainties, there is growing concern about the lack of positive response by the nation's leaders to the other challenges now confronting France.

The immediate result of this unease has been to strip another few points from President Mitterrand's popularity index. After ten years in office, the man lauded for his political astuteness is now increasingly perceived as vulnerable, even ailing, apparently incapable of stamping the authority of the Elysee Palace on the pace of events at home and abroad.

However, he denied reports of open disagreement between Mr Gorbachev and the foreign minister, Eduard Shevardnadze, over the extent of autonomy to be granted to the republics. Britain keeps up reputation for readily obeying EC laws

From Peter Guilford in Brussels

EUROPEAN Community countries have vastly improved their poor track record of implementing EC rules on time, diminishing fears that the single European market may be completed embarrassingly late after the muchpublicised 1992 deadline. Britain sustained its good reputation for obeying EC law, according to a report on 1989 by the European Commission published yesterday. But, like other states, its failure to abide by EC pollution standards is still a source of frustration. The commission describes its report as a "firm endeavour" to satisfy Douglas Hurd, the Foreign Secretary, who called for greater publicity to be given to the way member states implement FC laws in order to chivvy along the slower states. As a community average, 87 per cent of directives agreed by national ministers during meetings in Brussels are now being transposed into national law within the deadline, normally about 18 months later.

The survey suggests that while Britain is among the most efficient at obeying EC nual survey coincided with law, it reacts more stubbornly than others to threats of court action by Brussels. In 1989 Britain provoked 37 infringepartners except Denmark and Justice. Other nations, such as Germany, The Netherlands and Ireland, received more initial court threats than Britain but backed off more readily under pressure.

Belgium, Greece, France and Luxembourg all allowed a greater number of cases to go to the court than did Britain, while Italy remained in a league all of its own, with 35 cases taken to the European court. Despite its new "La Pergola" law designed to shunt EC directives rapidly through the Italian parliament. Italy's track record remains "dramatic", one commission spokesman said.

The government has pledged to bring its swimming waters up to EC standards by the end of the century. Brussels is insisting it does so by 1995, ten years after the EC's bathing water directive came into force.

Plain English may have last word in Baltic divide

anguage is becoming some-thing of a problem in the Baltic states. On Sunday I was trying to get through to various people on the telephone. None of their families spoke English, and on two occasions their less wellbred offsprings put the phone down on me when I tried to speak in Russian.

Since the three Baltic languages are incomprehensible not only to the outside world but also to each other this suggests a certain prob-lem of international contact in the years to come - a problem which completely bedevilled the attempts of the three republics to form a union in the 1920s and '30s.

In private, the Baltic leaders all speak to each other in Russian, but at joint public meetings national pride often demands that they all speak in their own languages, which then have to be translated into the other two languages as well as Russian and English - an incredibly cumbersome process, rich in opportunities for misinterpretation.

This attitude to Russian is the perfectly understandable response to years of russification under joke: in the Soviet Union, if you speak four languages, you are a Zionist; if you speak two languages, you are a nationalist; and if you speak one (Russian), you are an internationalist!

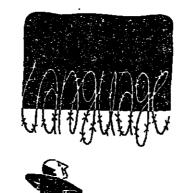

Trumpet blower: Bebop trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie helps celebrate the 30th anniversary of the Autibes

jazz festival by blowing out candles on a special cake

Most Balts think that English will ultimately become the official language of international communication in the Baltic of the future. However, it is possible that as in Central Europe, German trade and tourism will make German once more the real second language of Balts - despite its unfortunate historical association. An additional problem for Estonia: the main capitalist power is Finland, and many Estonians have already had to learn this language.

7 be idea of English as a Baltic international language has a certain pedigree. The Baltic was always a sort of linguistic swamp, and in the old days several other languages were strongly represented: Polish in Lithuania, German in Latvia and Estonia, and 'iddish throughout. Until 1911, the Latvian capital, Riga, had a German, Jewish and Russian

Soviet rule, summed up in the George Armistead. There used to be a sizeable English merchant community, with their own

This is now a student club, but the local Protestants are trying to get it back. Strictly speaking it should return to the Church of majority - and an English mayor, England, but these days the Anglican population here is rather limited.

o far, the only completely original joke to have emerged from the Baltic national revolutions goes as follows: "One of the Lithuanian radical nationalist deputies, Zigmas Vaisvila, supposedly proposes in parliament that Lithuania declare war on the Soviet Union - "because all the countries which lose wars against Russia end up much richer – look Germany". President Landsbergis thinks about it, then replies: "But what if we win?" r Vaisvila is now the head of one of the three new Lithuanian state security services, all headed by radical members of Sajudis and all competing with each other and presumably - with the KGB. The central aim of these bodies however seems to be to keep watch on their own government and administration, which the radicals distrust because of its continued domination by "Soviet bureaurecognisable because he only possesses one jacket, a sort of tweed affair which he must have bought at an early age, as it is now much too short for him. I've often thought of begging him to buy a new one, but perhaps under the circumstances this would no longer be advisable.

Mr Vaisvila is also simultaneously leader of the Sajudis paramilitary force in waiting and the Lithuanian Green Party. This mixture is only superficially curious. Green attitudes in the Baltic have as much to do with nationalism as with environmental problems.

This kind of approach is summed up in the work of nationalist thinkers like Gintaras Patackas, who hopes that Lithuanian national language and culture are characterised by true "content", by contrast with the super-"form" displayed by the decadent culture of the West, and that of the racially mixed, migratory Slavs. This is because it is rooted in the ethnic homogeneity of the Lithuanian nation and its attachment to the Lithuanian soil.

Mr Maude made it clear that his visit, during which he will hold talks with Li Peng, the prime minister, is ex-pected to mark a turning point in relations, healing the rift which developed after the People's Liberation Army opened fire on unarmed demonstrators.

In an interview with the BBC on the flight from Hong Kong, Mr Maude said the ban on soft loans "exists by consensus". He added: "A number of us think the time has come to start relaxing those measures, but we won't until we have a consensus."

The government is believed to be under pressure from British business to resume soft loans now that Japan has made clear its willingness to do so. Mr Maude said, however, that the resumption of military aid was "a long way down the line".

Tian Zengpei, deputy for-eign minister, said last night at a banquet in Mr Maude's honour that, despite the "twists and turns" in Sino-British relations over the past year, he hoped the visit would "mark the start of a good working relationship between us". Mr Tian said that, while China and Britain did "not always see eye to eye on certain issues, the two sides share much common ground".

However, the visit has been overshadowed by Mr Maude's shift from the Foreign Office. His visit also coincides with the final debates on the Hong Kong nationality package in Britain, and passage of the Bill of Rights in Hong Kong. Both displease China intensely.

Mr Maude defended the usefulness of his trip, although he will have nothing more to do with Hong Kong after his return to Britain. "I speak for the government as a whole, as I would have done if this appointment had not taken place. I've been very inti-

The Foreign Office has not yet made clear who will inherit responsibility for Hong Kong at the Foreign Office. Mr Mande is due to meet Mr Li today. Some on the British side believe that such high-level access is a measure of China's eagerness for improved links. Diplomats here believe, however, that rather than heralding increased Chinese flexibility, the meeting may simply serve a propaganda purpose.

China has maintained since last June that attempts to isolate the country are impos-sible. When Mr Maude shakes hands with Mr Li, who was closely identified with the June 4 massacre, it will inevitably be used as evidence to support this view.

Mr Maude will also be seeing Wu Xueqian, the deputy prime minister, and holding meetings with British businessmen and Chinese officials responsible for trade and Hong Kong.

Some observers have suggested that Mr Maude is preparing the way for a visit by Mr Hurd before the end of the year. Diplomats believe that the Chinese would be very eager for such a trip.

Mr Maude said he would be trying to explain to China why Britain had formulated the mately involved in the formanationality package, which tion of British policy as awards 50,000 Hong Kong regards Hong Kong, and I families British passports.

Also vestenday, the North rejected a South Korean invitation to hold talks on Friday to discuss an on-site inspection of alleged walls on both sides of the border and to discuss changes to tough sec-urity laws in both countries.

The North denied it had walls to inspect. The South accused the North of trying to drive a wedge between the government and the opposition. This would be easy, given this week's mass resignations from the South worked in an area where squid begin their life cycle. The area is just north of the Falklands' 150-mile fishing zone, where the squid reach maturity. Overfishing has depleted stocks inside the zone and forced the islands to close their fishery five weeks early.

The move reflects frustration over Britain's refusal to take decisions which islanders say are vital to their future prosperity.

Most of the islands' revenue comes from selling licences to catch illex, one of two squid species caught in the area. The Legislative Council has been trying for more than a year to persuade the British government to extend the fishing zone to 200 miles, which refusal, the islanders believe, is that extending the zone would upset Argentina, which claims sovereignty. Terry Peck, a Legislative Council member, said the islanders felt their vital interests were at stake. "We would like to have more say

THE United States made its first official contact yesterday with the Hanoi-backed Cambodian government, when a US air force plane arrived in the capital, Phnom Penh. The aircraft carried a team of forensic experts who will examine what may be the remains of servicemen listed as missing in the Vietnam War which ended 15 years ago.

The C141 transport was the first American aircraft to land in Phnom Penh since US diplomats and other personnel withdrew in 1975 as the Khmer Rouge advanced on the capital. The Americans said the mission was purely humanitarian and had no political component, but it is seen as a significant American move towards developing relations with the Phnom Penh government which is not recognised by Western

Last week the Secretary of State, James Baker, said the United States was withdrawing its diplomatic recognition of the three-party resistance coalition which is fighting Phnom Penh and would talk to Vietnam about ending the war. Later, American officials said there would also be talks with Phnom Penh.

Washington has always insisted that there can be no normal relations with Vietnam until the issue of the missing men is resolved. Before leaving Bangkok, the American officials said their visit to Phnom Penh was a breakthrough.

Appeals over the past five years for the handing over of remains had been ignored. Cambodian officials say they have human remains, identity discs and personal belongings which could confirm the fate of more than 30 Americans. Most of the 82 servicemen and nine civilians listed as missing were airmen whose planes went down over Cambodia.

During searches for remains in recent years the Americans have recovered 245 in Vietnam and 36 in Laos. More than 2,000 men are still unaccounted for.

Man in the News: David Souter

Questions surround shy nominee to Supreme Court

From Martin Fletcher

IN NOMINATING Judge David Souter of New Hampshire for the US Supreme Court, President Bush appears to have pulled off the impossible. He has unearthed a man of unquestioned intellectual stature about whose personal views so little is known that he has left all his potential critics spluttering. Apart from the bald facts of Judge Souter's legal career, all that anyone could immediately say about him was that he is aged 50, a slight, shy bachelor who lives in a ramshackle. book-strewn farmhouse in New Hampshire, drives to work in a logue. Those preparing for a re-run of the Senate's 1987 lynching of Robert Bork, President's Reagan's Supreme Court nominee, were left clutching at air. So finely balanced is the Supreme Court on the explosive issue of abortion that Mr Bush faced an outcry whether he nominated someone overtly for or against.

In all his legal career, however, Judge Souter appears to have participated in just one abortion case, which offered scant evidence of his personal opinion. "I think it's known only to him and God", observed one legal colleague.

Given the chance to shift the Supreme Court's centre of gravity decisively to the right, Mr Bush also faced a battle with either the Democrat-controlled Senate if he nominated a hardline conservative, or with his own Republican right-wing if he did not. In contrast to Judge Bork, Judge Souter, in his 22 years of service, has made no controversial speeches or expressed any overtly political views.

Though the Senate unanimously confirmed Judge Souter's appointment to the First US Circuit Court of Appeals in April, Howard Metzenbaum, a Democratic senator, and the other senators involved, can remember nothing about him.

Conservatives are taking heart from the fact that he was appointed to New Hampshire's Supreme Court in 1983 by John Sununu, then state governor, now White House Chief of Staff and the administration's leading right-winger.

Mr Bush insisted he had not sought Judge Souter's views on sensitive issues, but nevertheless depicted him as a man who would "interpret the Constitution and not legislate from the bench". That was a way of signalling his belief that Judge Souter was a conservative and not a judicial activist like William Brennan, the court's foremost liberal, whose retirement created the

Mr Bush may have temporarily silenced his potential critics by nominating a man whose views are so opaque, but there are inherent risks in such a strategy. The president clearly believes he has nominated a mainstream conservative: but so did Eisenhower when he appointed Justice Brennan in 1956. According to military experts, Iraq's main concern is the security of navigation to its Gulf port of Umm al-Qasr, which Baghdad claims would be greatly enhanced if it was to be allowed its own facilities on the disputed island.

Earlier, Iraq's President Saddam Hussein, always deeply distrusted by Kuwait's ruling Sabah family, left little doubt about his belligerent intentions when he indirectly accused Kuwait of adopting American policies, adding "Iraqis will not forget the saying that cutting necks is better than cutting means of Iraq's tactics, exemplified this week by the dispatch of some 30,000 elite troops backed by tanks and missiles towards the disputed border, are not new. Since the Gulf War ceasefire of August 1988, least one illegal incursion into Kuwaiti territory soon after the sheikhdom reopened relations with Iran.

The latest troop movements are seen to have the same purpose - to provide a crude eminder to Kuwait that it big brother" across the border is keeping a close watch on its diplomatic behaviour and oil policies.

"They are designed to put the frighteners on Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates", said Don Kerr, an expert from the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies.

Kuwait has more than enough reason to be disgruntled at Iraq's behaviour. After the start of the 1980 Gulf War, Kuwait's differences with the Iraqis were quickly put aside, as Baghdad struggled to contain the Iranian push into what it labelled Arab territory. With the port of Basra closed, Kuwait quickly became the leading port of entry for Iraqi imports, and it provided around $30,000 million to help the Iraqi war effort. This in turn attracted the hostility of Iran, and forced Kuwait to seek foreign protection by re-registering its tankers, with the United States agreeing to re-flag and protect II of them. Ironically, the end of the Gulf War 23 months ago provided a new and unexpected threat to Kuwait's security, as over-production of oil forced down world prices and drove Iran and Iraq, both in desperate need for cash to reconstruct their war-damaged economies, into an unholy alliance of interest against quota-breakers. Iraq, which has almost double the number of men under arms as there are Kuwaiti nationals, was especially hard hit by this year's six-month slide in oil revenues. Bagh-dad's heavy-handed campaign to force up prices to $25 a barrel from the current Opec barrel quickly won support from Tehran, its former implacable enemy.

"Concerning oil policies," explained the Iranian oil minister, Gholamreza Agazadeh those of Iraq and this also applies to other members (of Opec) and should not be disregarded."

Saudi Arabia, a member along with Kuwait of the six-Council, was originally sympathetic to the Iraqi initiative. but is reported to have become deeply disturbed at the possible consequences of Baghdad's sabre-rattling for the whole Gulf region.

here is a sense of inevitability about the financial revelations emerging from the NUM. Since the 1984-5 strike. the union has had a disastrous history. It has fractured once, and with barely 50,000 members could yet fracture again. The financial goings-on are but the latest episode in a tragedy which now contains elements of farce. Arthur Scargill was spotted wearing dark glasses at Leeds/Bradford airport at the weekend, seeking to fly to Paris under the assumed name of 'Arthur Fenn. His cover was blown. Yesterday, a four-man NUM delegation flew to Paris to Heathfield in their guise as of--ficials of the International Miners' Organisation (IMO). Is this the •–real world?

The tragi-comedy is a direct result of the politics of Arthur Scargill. He inhabits a political world of cardboard cut-outs. The renemy is Thatcherism and the state. The heroes are the working relass. The ultimate weapon is the strike, the longer the better. Those who oppose him within the labour -movement are not only enemies but traitors, be they the Notstinghamshire miners, the TUC or Mr Kinnock. All that is needed is the right leadership from those who understand and never waver.
This kind of politics is based on arrogance. It assumes that you always know best, that those who disagree are to be despised, that compromise is a sign of weakness, that the enemy must be destroyed.

It leads to intolerance, to disrespect for those who do not concur, to a sense of infallibility and to the cult of the personality. It has even led Mr Scargill to refer to himself in speeches and inter-views in the third person as "Mr Scargill". This kind of politics is deeply authoritarian because it respects only one position, one set of ideas, one line, and because it leads to a steady and irresistible centralisation of power. The story of the NUM under Arthur Scargill's presidency is of a steady process of accretion of power,

The recent financial revelations are the latest hair-raising evidence. Alongside the official NUM accounts were the unofficial accounts, 17 secret bank accounts, the existence of which was unknown to the NUM national exec-utive committee until last December. This was the personal fiefdom of Mr Scargill, an enormous source of personal power often by arbitrary means.

The story of the NUM has a strangely familiar ring to it. The process of degeneration bears an uncanny resemblance to the tale of Eastern Europe. Here were leaders who thought they knew best, who believed they were in command of the laws of history, who brooked no compromise or opposition, who regarded class as everything and democracy as a bourgeois diversion, and who amassed enormous arbitrary power. But the similarities are not simply a matter of ideology.

Mr Scargill was a long-time admirer of these regimes: on an official visit to Moscow he scolded Khrushchev for removing Stalin's body from the mausoleum; he supported the Soviet tanks which rolled into Prague in 1968 and Afghanistan in 1979, and he was a vigorous opponent of Solidarity. After gaining the NUM presi-dency, he took the union out of the Western-orientated Miners International and laid plans for the establishment of the IMO, which was to include the NUM, the French communist union federation (CGT), and Soviet and East European unions. He looked east for international alliances. The IMO, eventually formed in 1985, became Mr Scargill's personal domain, and it is here that the Soviet and East European funds, which Gavin Lightman QC suggests are the rightful property of the NUM, are now lodged.

There is one further parallel between Eastern Europe and Scargillism. Last year marked the death of Stalinism, Leninism, call it what you will. (And with it, of course, comes the imminent end of several organisations with Soviet links, such as the IMO.) Bolshevism has finally hit the buffers. But not only in that part of the world, for it is also true here. Mr Scargill may still be president of the NUM, and he may still command an extraordinary loyalty from many of his followers, but this has little meaning other than the negative one of prevent-ing the NUM finding a new role for itself. He is now a man without influence or honour.

One is struck these days by how distant and remote the miners' strike seems. Only five years have passed since it came to its bitter conclusion, but it seems like another age. And it was. The strike marked the end of the era of big struggles over jobs, of the idea that militant trade unions could unseat Mrs Thatcher, of the belief in the centrality of old-style notions of class. It also symbolised the beginning of the post-industrial age. Recognition of a new social and cultural environment often requires a catalyst, and the miners' strike provided one.

For a while the labour movement was without purpose, demoralised and directionless. Then, after the 1987 election, the mood began to change. For the first time for a decade or more, it began to think. It began to scrap its old ideological baggage and to address the modern world as it is rather than as it was supposed to be. From that moment the movement began to change. Out of the defeat of Scargillism and the miners' strike was born the labour movement of the Nineties.

When a detective goes to pieces hat a detective story...

Hardly anyone reading
how the Times chess correspondent, Raymond Keene, tackled the case of the suspect problem setter can have failed to exclaim some such words as these. Oh yes, they will have said, I must have read dozens of crime stories where the clues were wrapped up in references to the chess board. There was ... well, I've forgotten, but there must be others.

By and large, I am sorry to say, there are not. I rather fear the reason may be that we detectivestory merchants are not quite as brilliantly intelligent as we like the public to think we are. The sheer complexities of chess defeat us, and, tempting though the notion is, by and large we cannot for the life of us contrive to wriggle the game into our simpler exercises. Or can it be that we all recall the opening of the first detective story, Edgar Alian Poe's "The Murders in the Rue Morgue"?

Introducing Chevalier C. Auguste Dupin, first of the great detectives. Poe asserts, with his tongue perhaps in his intellectual cheek, that "The higher powers of the reflective intellect are more decidedly and more usefully tasked by the unostentatious game of draughts than by all elaborate frivolity of chess." Some few of us, however, have over the years attempted to incor-But in general the best that porate the elaborate frivolity into crime writers have managed is to our stories. Leslie Cargill, a 1930s writer who just scrapes into T.J. Binyon's study of the detective in fiction, Murder Will Out, had as his sleuth Morrison Sharpe, an expert on puzzles and chess who is shown using his skills to keep a step ahead of the Inspector Lestrades of his day. Significantly, however, the Morrison Sharpe books have slid into the limbo that a second reading.

Keeping his head a little more above water is another 1930s above water is another 1930s writer, J.J. Counington (pseudonym for Alfred Walter Stewart, professor of chemistry at Queen's University, Belfast), the author of 17 stories featuring Sir Clinton Driffield, chief constable of an imaginary English county, along with a good many other "tecs", as they were called in the heyday of the puzzle tale. Sir Clinton is a chess-player of quality, and in at least one of his cases, The Danger-field Talisman, Connington comfield Talisman, Connington combines the mystery of the disappearendow, sometimes arbitrarily, a hero with chess ability by way of proof (unsubstantiated) of giant intellectual powers. The American Jacques Futrelle's "thinking ma-chine", Professor S.F.X. Van Dusen, is an example. He gained his soubriquet by demonstrating that a stranger to chess "might, by the force of inevitable logic, defeat a champion", though we are not shown what astounding moves he made to do so. To do him justice, he does demonstrate splendid ingenuity in perhaps the best of all "locked-room" stories, The Prob-iem of Cell 13. Otherwise, we crime writers have from time to time found it convenient to put over the deviousness of a suspect by showing him at the board, though seldom if ever saying exactly what moves were made. I have done it myself, though not on a board but on the cloth that chess is played on in India. Inspector Ghote, apparently, knows enough of the game to see that the village headman he

his rani diagonally from one corner of the cloth to the other to take an opposing vizier, clicking the two pieces together in loud triumph" - domination, if not villainy, established. But the most unlikely chess fanatic in a crime story is the private eye who recalls at the end of one case how he "went home and put my old house clothes on and set the chessmen out and mixed a drink and played over another Capablanca. It went to fifty-nine moves. Beautiful, cold, remorseless chess, almost creepy. in its silent implacability" Raymond Chandler's Marlowe, in The High Window.

If chess has more or less defeated crime writers, another form of intellectual games playing — the crossword — has had its triumphs. These include such modern masterpieces of ingenuity as Ruth Rendell's One Across, Two Down, with one of her delicious nasties enamoured equally of cryptic clues and sticky ends, and Patricia Moyes Six-Letter Word for Death in which a group of crime writers are the confusing suspects for poor Chief Inspector against the astrologer. "He moved L Savers involved Lord Peter in a crossword whimsy, a short story called "Uncle Meleager's Will" in which the puzzle is laid out in marble tiles at the bottom (such characteristic erndition) of an impluvium. Confionted with one of the tougher clues, Lord Peter exclaims: Bunter, bring me a whisky and soda!" The best-known crosswordist of them all perhaps, thanks to the charm of John Thaw on television. is Colin Dexier's Inspector Morse, who is sustained equally by pints of beer and quick battles with the back page of The Times. Yet here a doubt creeps in Though in print. Morse is hooked on his puzzles on television he is seldom seen writing in the answers. Can this be because television shows life more accurately than crime writers do? It is a thought borne out by the progress of the genre itself. Few-nowadays are the crime authors who put puzzle at their masi-head. Perhaps Edgar Allan Poe was right all along. Simple, every day draughts are more suited to writing about the murderous in-stract than beguiting but bedevilling chess:

In terminal decline—or will Bush pull out of his dive?

the early 1960s he was the classic earnest student, displaying a quiet spirit, a dry humour, piercing intelligence — and a college scarf. In the ensuing 30 years he has lived up to his tutors' expectations, piling up a record of public service, thinking much but writing little, impressing the powerful without challenging them. And he still wears his scarf amid the snows of New Hampshire as though he were just leaving his old college staircase. On Monday President Bush picked this virtual unknown, as though from a C.P. Snow novel, and paraded him as his administration's first new member of the United States Supreme Court. As the two men faced reporters, it was clear, even to those who hardly knew Judge Souter, that Washington's hopes of a political brawl could be forgotten. The city had spent the weekend in anticipation. This was the time, smart opinion predicted, when the president would have to appease his conservative critics by appointing a full-blooded opponent of abortion to the Supreme Court. Many liberals also secretly hoped for a battle in which they could repeat their victory over President Reagan's ultra-conservative nominee, Robert Bork. In the event, it was all anti-climax. Perfect constitutional manners were the order of the day. Questions about Judge Souter's views were treated with the disdain reserved for the man who passed the port the wrong way. But the questions remain. And beyond the future of abortion in America and the legality of affirmative action programmes to help racial minorities, there is a bigger political question. Has George Bush pulled off another brilliant short-term coup, soaring skywards and confounding the critics who would like to see him fall? Or has he put trouble-free popularity before political principles once too often? Has he missed an important opportunity to repair the political machinery which he inherited from Mr Reagan but which is now coming apart at the

The president has been put on the defensive over the rescue of savings and loans companies (building societies). While senior Democrats were being found guilty of S&L malpractices, the public did not seem to care much, but now that Mr Bush's son, Neil, is in the spotlight as a result of one spectacular crash, all Republicans are feeling the heat.

A Gallup Poll last week put disapproval of the White House's handling of the S&L rescue at 58 per cent, and of the federal deficit at 64 per cent. According to a Wall Street Journal poli only 48 per cent approved Bush's manage-

There is little overt criticism of the president's handling of East-West relations; simply the feeling that he may be too much the man of his time, too naturally clubbable at a period when the United States is being nudged from superpower status.

Mr Bush is not a man to throw his weight around. He has generalised good intentions towards education and the environment but little will to risk himself for them. ...and moreover

From Letters to the Editor,

Sir, May I add my voice to those of your many readers who have lamented the recent passing of the well-loved poll tax? Since its inception 30 years ago, it has, as your correspondents have pointed out, carved itself a special niche in the hearts of the British people. To change it now for some new-fangled tax is tantamount to killing off a very dear and venerable old companion. I feel sure that your readers can think of many other examples of beloved institutions that have been destroyed in recent years by the insensitive actions of the so-called reformers.

Yours faithfully, Paul Wheatcroft (Major).

Sir, Further to the letter from Major Wheatcroft (July 24), may I beg leave to condemn the wanton destruction of many of our finest old multistorey National Car Parks? These noble and delightful buildings have, for the past 50 years or more. greatly enhanced the character of many of our city centres. The simple beauty of their clear horizontal lines, manufactured in some of the finest grey concrete, lends cohesion to their surroundings. Members of our organisation are fighting to preserve these vital parts of our national heritage. For just £10,000 a year - no more, after all, than the price of a couple of gin and tonics - members are taken on guided tours of early National Car Parks (this year's expeditions include NCPs in Birmingham and Wolverhampton) as well as receiving a free booklet, Remove Ticket Now: The Magic of the NCP. Yours etc.

Peregrine Stamp (Miss). Secretary, NCP Heritage League.

July 27, 2020 Sir, It is, alas, not only such magnificent old institutions as the poll tax and NCPs that are disappearing under the iron heels of the progressives. Our leadership itself is in decline. Take, for instance, the National Union of Mineworkers. There are those of us who still remember with affection the balmy days when Arthur Scargill was its president. A charming man, a cheery quip

ever playing on his lips, he would always be ready with handy advice to one and all, delivered in those gentle tones once memorably compared to the chirruping of a lark. These days, alas, the NUM leadership is ruled by the politically motivated, an idea which would have left dear old Arthur, loved as he was by employers, workers and the general public alike, quite bemused. Yours faithfully. George Johnson.

July 29, 2020 Sir, Am I alone in lamenting the decline of the Pot Noodle? This hallowed national dish, for so long the staple fayre of millions of ordinary working people, is, I understand, to be phased out. Soon the beleaguered consumer will be forced to purchase raw meat, to be cooked at home - a potential health hazard and a slap in the face for all those who value the great culinary tra-ditions of the British way of life. Yours faithfully, Geoffrey Gale.

July 31, 2020 Sir, I feel most strongly that the old M25 motorway should not be allowed to disappear without tribute. As dear to the heart of every Londoner as the River Thames, the M25 has gained a unique position in our national life by preserving the more leisurely pace of happier times. The Sunday afternoon picnic on the M25, with thousands of families laying out their rugs on the tarmac surrounded by stationary cars, has become a timehonoured part of the fabric of the British lifestyle, and to see this hallowed tradition destroyed will be deplored by parents and children alike. Yours truly,

August 2, 2020 Sir. Might I bemoan the demise of the much-cherished video nasty? At the turn of the century, it would have been unthinkable for a family of four to eat their dinner without first sitting down to enjoy an example of this, the finest flowering of the cinematic art. Personally, I blame it all on the decline of the Pot Noodle, the phasing-out of the poll tax and the destruction of the National Car Parks. This would never have happened in Arthur Scargill's day.

Yours faithfully.

Gavin Deedes.

Portofolio for a rainy day

ne job both wets and dries were anxious to avoid in the reshuffle was that of minister for drought. A total of 15. rainless days meant that an official drought was declared on the day that ministers were being summoned to Downing Street to be told of their new responsibilities, and those being reshuffled at the environment department were distinctly worried that they might be given the job of persuading the heavens to open.

Denis Howell, Labour's last minister for sport, is still best remembered as the minister for drought who was preparing for a full-scale emergency but managed to engineer a torrential downpour within ten days of his appointment. My plans for moving millions of gallons around the country are still in the department's files." Howell said yesterday. "They included installing two pipelines down the fast lane of the M5 to move water to the west country. However, the environment department insists: "Water is a much more important issue now. It has risen above the rank of sports minister." This will no doubt come as a great relief to Robert Atkins, who yesterday took up his new duties in succession to Colin Moynihan. Responsibility for water is shared between David Heathcoat-Amory and David Trippier, but the DoE says: "The feeling is that Mrs Thatcher will not have a specific minister for drought if the dry spell continues. It raises expectations of a quick-fix solution which cannot always be met." If the wells continue to run dry, however, the odds are on Trippier being the man asked to call on us all to bath

Until recently the Trippier fam-ily was blissfully unaffected by the now annual drought: its domestic water was pumped in from an underground spring at their Pennine home. But even environment ministers are not immune from the attentions of environmental health officers. The water was declared impure, and Trippier was ordered to start boiling any spring water his family used. As a consequence he is now on mains supply and, come August, will probably be queuing at the standpipe with the rest of us.

• David Mellor, the new arts minister, wasted no time yesterday in establishing his cultural credentials. Despite a three-line whip, he missed a vote on a Labour censure motion on the economy. He was at Glyndebourne, enjoying the opera and a party to mark the end of his tenure as deputy chairman of the London Philharmonic Society. 'The whips were very generous,' sound proofing and anti-bugging equipment. If the plans are approved the ground will also change its name to the Circle."

"Of course it's tongue-in-cheek" says the advertising agency D'Arcy Masius Benton and Bowles. "It's a quietly whimsical celebration of roundness." As our media pages explain today, there is little to stop advertisers taking such names in vain, but the Surrey authorities are not amused. "We would not be at all receptive to the idea of being called the Circle." says David Seward, the club secretary. "We have been called the Oval since 1850."

Not quite: for the past two years the ground has officially been the Foster's Oval. Foster's itself is more relaxed about the spoof. We tend to do this sort of thing to others," it says, "so we can't complain if someone turns the tables on us.

THE PRICE OF ROYALTY

The Civil List announcement has long been as much part of the annual parliamentary ritual as the Queen's Speech and the ceremony of Black Rod. Despite being part and parcel of the Treasury vote, and subject to the customary uplifting for inflation, it can be relied on to offer a battleground between monarchists and (a very few) republicans, and an opportunity for ribald comment on the workload of lesser members of the royal family.

The vulgar misnomer "rise" is customarily used, conveying the false idea that the money is for personal spending and consumption rather than, as is the case with the Queen, to sustain with appropriate dignity the nation's head of state and the family that supports her in her public duties. Most of the money is needed to cover staff. The use to which the money is put is similar to that in all countries with heads of state, certainly those whose head of state is separate from its chief executive. Since Britain's head of state has an international status and, not to mince words, is of immense value to the tourist account, the expenditure must be seen as worthwhile.

The prime minister's announcement yesterday of a changed system of payment, which was made with the Queen's approval and after consultation with the Leader of the Opposition, is wholly welcome. including the sting in its tail. The proposal is not so much a new system as a reversion to a method which came to an end as a result of inflation in the 1970s.

Ever since George III exchanged the crown estates for a parliamentary grant, the Civil List had been fixed at the beginning of each reign. In 1971, a parliamentary select committee recommended that, as a consequence of inflation, the List should be reviewed every ten years. That change was never made. The royal household was virtually out of money and had to plead for immediate help from the government. The then Wilson government instituted the annual review, the effect of which has been to give unfair ammunition to reflex-action critics of the royal family and to sacrifice sensible long-term planning by the royal household in favour of annual wrangling, much in the manner of all public organisations in receipt of state subsidy.

The change announced yesterday reintroduces the 1971 select committee proposals. The Queen's household will receive a steady £7.9 million a year for ten years, compared with the present £5.09 million. This, in theory, enables additional money received in the early years of the decade to be "invested" against the declining value of cash receipts in later years. The value of the grant will depend on inflation, though the prime minister made it clear that if inflation should soar then the grant would be

By common consent, the royal family is a popular recipient of public expenditure, whose cost compares favourably with that of other heads of state. In answer to a question by Labour's Neil Kinnock, who endorsed the changed system, Mrs Thatcher said that over the past three years Civil List spending had risen by only 18 per cent compared with local authorities' 34 per cent. Much work is put out to private tender and the new arrangements will give further opportunities for cost cutting. Above all, by being provided with ten years of guaranteed income the royal household will be free to plan its spending ahead, with a built-in disincentive to planned profligacy.

The soundness of this reform need not be lost on other sectors of government. If such long-term financing is thought to induce efficiency, good management and deflationary behaviour in the royal family, why should it not do so in other recipients of public money? The Queen could yet have performed a great royal service: breaking the Treasury's idiotic mind-set that nobody (but itself) can be trusted with the public's money for more than 12 months at a time.

A BULLY IN THE GULF

Arab oil ministers gathering in Geneva for tomorrow's Opec summit must be praying that Iraq's belligerent threat to "break necks" in neighbouring Kuwait, accompanied yesterday by the dispatch of two divisions to the disputed border, is no more than heavy-fisted economic blackmail. If so, money could put the sabres belonging to the Arab world's most formidable military force back in their sheaths. Opec could agree new production quotas favouring Iraq, and Kuwait and Saudi Arabia could quietly write off some $30 billion in credits extended to Baghdad during the Iran-Iraq war.

Nobody in the region, however, underestimates Iraq's political and territorial ambitions, or its unpredictability. The rush by Saudi Arabia, the Arab League and Egypt's President Mubarak to mediate, without waiting for the Opec meeting, suggests that few leaders are prepared to bank on the danger of war subsiding so easily. Given Iraq's territorial Ottoman empire, and the ease with which its forces could overrun the sheikhdom, the most alarming aspect of the menaces from Iraq is the absence of an obvious casus belli.

President Saddam Hussein's initial broadside against Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates last week, accusing them of "direct aggression", certainly cited economic grievances. Their quota-busting, he said, had been a "stab in the back", driving down oil prices at a cost to Iraq of $14 billion. Both countries, however, had already agreed to cut their output, and Iraq hardly needed to carry its onslaught to the present pitch to remind them that, this time, they had better keep their word.

More ominous was President Saddam's accusation that Kuwait had stolen $2.4 billion worth of oil from an Iraqi oilfield close to the disputed border. Kuwait promptly countered with accusations that Iraq, on the contrary, had been siphoning off Kuwait's oil - adding pointedly that it had "a rich record" of violating Kuwaiti territory.

That is well-documented. The two came close to war in 1961, when British and Arab League forces forestalled Iraqi annexation of Kuwait, and again in 1973. Iraq, which covets Kuwait's rich oil reserves and wants better access to the Gulf, periodically tries to enforce its claims to large tracts of the border, and recognises Kuwait's claim to exist at all only reluctantly. Baghdad demands a lease on Bubivan Island in the Gulf, which the Kuwaitis fear would presage further territorial claims.

Kuwait has now deposited a record of alleged Iraqi violations of its territory with the United Nations. Iraq has countered by accusing Kuwait of internationalising the dispute. Diplomatically, that would be in Kuwait's interest, given its military vulnerability. Its friends are reluctant to be drawn.

The Pentagon's nervousness about engaging in the Gulf can only have been enhanced by the recent, unexpected, improvement in Iran-Iraq relations (and the knowledge that Iran, too weak to exploit Irag's quarrel with Kuwait, might compensate by harassing the forces of the "Great Satan"). Britain, which has treaties to consult "in time of need" with the Emirates, Qatar and Bahrain, and a firmer alliance with Oman, has a strong interest in a diplomatic solution. So does Israel, whose vital interests would be threatened by any further expansion of Iraqi power and wealth.

Iraq's muscle-flexing is a sharp reminder of the danger of leaving the Middle East on the diplomatic back burner. Yet at this stage, the West will only make matters worse by overactive intervention. Iraq is already denouncing Kuwait as an American puppet. President Mubarak's mediation, backed by Saudi and Kuwaiti gold, offers the best chance of defusing the immediate crisis. But later on, the Security Council's five permanent members should jointly put pressure on Iraq to accept a permanent territorial settlement. The dispute cannot be left to fester. Conflagrations in the Gulf can unsettle not just the world's foreign exchange and oil markets, but peace itself.

UNBALANCING BROADCASTERS

From time to time MPs suffer a rush of blood to the head which persuades them they could make a better job of broadcasting than the broadcasters. More than a hundred Tory members have signed a Commons motion demanding a statutory balance of opinion in television, and calling on the Lords to amend the broadcasting bill this week to that effect. This is odd, not least as the MPs had every chance to amend the bill themselves but were too scared of the whips to try. Some of the nation's elected legislators now perform their constitutional function by signing motions pleading with the hereditary chamber to do their job for them.

Broadcasters have been on the defensive against parliament for the past decade. That is the price they pay for being granted oligopoly rights under parliamentary statute to a limited resource, radio wavelength. But in an age of four or five public channels, plus satellite and cable television, space on the radiowave spectrum is rapidly becoming less scarce. Television is approaching the range of choice offered by national newspapers. This is the age of less regulation rather than of tighter statutory control. Deregulation should refer not just to who may broadcast, but also to what they may broadcast.

The notion of a statutory requirement for balance was dreamt up by Lord Wyatt of Weeford and Lord Orr-Ewing, the authors of the Lords amendment, who have adopted a conspiratorial view of the television producers' fraternity. There is little evidence for or against such a conspiracy, but the Wyatt view is widely shared, not least by Tory backbenchers although their parliamentary duties keep them from a comprehensive sampling of television output. The proposal is that every television item which presents a controversial point of view, however defined, should be followed by a discussion offering an alternative point of view, and a further programme presenting that alternative view at length. The tribunal responsible for arbitrating on this complex regulation, Lords Wyatt and Orr-Ewing suggest, would be the Broadcasting Standards Council, or something like it. This would issue a code of practice on impartiality, and adjudicate on complaints arising from it.

The objections hardly bare rehearsal. Who is to say which issues are controversial, which alternative points of view are to be allowed that privilege of reply? There are seldom only two viewpoints. The possibility for mischief and nonsense is endless.

From time to time programmes do indeed offer the viewer a distinctive point of view, and the general quality of British television is the better for that. Some of those points of view will be left wing, some right wing, indeed for or against almost any conceivable position. It is unrealistic to suppose that viewers are automatically brainwashed by the view offered; they are just as likely to be fortified in their hostility to it.

The proposal of Lords Wyatt and Orr-Ewing would reduce all television programming to the level of party political broadcasting, the most boring and least persuasive feature of the television schedule. That would do nothing for impartiality. It would merely make good television worse, undermining imaginative creativity, and leaving nothing to the professional responsibility of the broadcaster. Of course those in charge of broadcasting have an obligation to the fair use of the influence that their oligopoly gives them. That obligation may be abused and broadcasters, like politicians, should be attacked when it is. But statutory control imposed from another corner of the political jungle, the House of Commons, is no way to make this obligation real. It would lead to empty and irresponsible broadcasting.

Personally I would be delighted to see the hard ecu proposal become the bridge from Stage One to full EMU (European monetary union) and it may well be the best way to prepare the Twelve for full EMU membership. But it is unlikely that even having lived for a few years with a hard ecu, all Twelve will be able to accept a regime of fixed exchange rates at the same time. We follow an accepted procedure by which proposals for gradual and manageable repayment are made, acceptance of which by the creditor involves the freezing of all future interest charges. From Mr A. Dawe Sir, I have read with interest the Chancellor of the Exchequ recent concerns (report, July 16) about the amount of credit maintained within our financial system and the problems it generates within our economy. My recent experiences trying to purchase some furniture from high-street retailers led me to believe that our current credit situation is supplydriven, not demand-led.

All the stores I approached offered a variety of credit terms, most including an "interest-free" finance offer. All offered a sale reduction and most were prepared to concede further discounts when pressed without modification to the credit options available.

However, none was prepared to offer an additional discount for cash despite their having to discount the agreed price to the finance company under the "in-terest-free" offer by at least 11/4 per cent per month. I therefore took out a credit purchase deal and added myself to the economy's "credit mountain".

I presume that I am not alone in being forced down this route to increased debt by our retail infrastructure and its cosy relationship with our banks and other financial institutions.

NHS reforms

From Dr Michael Morris

Sir, I write to defend Dr LeFanu's "confused and confusing" article (July 18) from Mr Clarke's brutal and unwarranted attack (July 21). Mr Clarke rightly states that "the acid test of confidence in the (general practitioner budget-holding) scheme is the number of GPs coming forward". By his own criterion, it is now clear that Mr

Clarke's proposals have failed. The first wave of about 900 practices who had "shown interest" (often they were just looking for more information about the government's proposals) has shrunk to less than half that number. The General Medical Services Committee (of GPs) overwhelmingly opposes budgetholding schemes because they threaten the doctor-patient relationship. In Gallup polls, 79 per

Finally Mr Clarke says that "the cost of this (investment) will be more than paid for by the benefits it brings". This assertion is un-proven. If Mr Clarke is so certain his untried and untested plans will work why does he not allow pilot trials to take place?

Sir, Before releasing in England 11 young red kites from Spain (report. Then kite eggs imported from Spain were hatched here and in due time the young birds were released into

OBITUARIES

Joe Turner, American jazz pianist, died in Paris aged 82 on July 21. He was born in Baltimore on November 3.

JAZZ pianists of the 1920s and 1930s were inclined to be self contained, playing entirely solo, disdaining the support of guitar or bass or drums, relying on their own left hands for all the rhythm and harmony they needed. Pianists of that sort - James P. Johnson, Fats Waller, Willie "The Lion" Smith, all classed as "stride" players - were the musicians the 17 year-old Joe Turner admired most when he arrived in New York in 1925.

During the earlier part of his career he played in various bands, yet rarely mixed with the other instrumentalists, "We didn't become personal buddies and hang out together after the job was done," he explained, "I'd rather hurry over to some place where the hours were long and an interesting pianist was holding forth. I can't learn much from a treathone always or a major. a trombone player or a guitarist, but many pianists knew a few tricks I might be eager to adopt - performing them, of course, in my very own way."

He owed his musical beginnings to his mother, who started teaching him the piano at the age of five. From his father he inherited what he always regarded as an iron constitution. ("He was as strong as an ox, a furniture mover who could carry a grand piano on his back without any help"). Soon after arriving in New York Turner found himself working - for $30 a week — at Baron Wilkins's club in Harlem. He went on to play successively with bands led by the trumpeter June Clark, Benny Car-ter and in 1930 Louis Armstrong. He also claimed to have worked around New York with one of King Oliver's later bands.

ing fraternity, competing with his heroes at "rent parties" and other late-night functions. In 1931 he became one of two pianists (the other was first Alex Hill, then Francis Carter) who accompanied the singer Adelaide Hall. It was while touring with her that Turner first encountered Art Tatum, taken aback when Tatum responded to his bravura version of "Liza" with just two words: "pretty good"; but after listening to Tatum per-form he realised that was praise enough. Tatum's virtuosity had an effect on Turner, especially his use of a more clipped and brisk left

After the Vigors company had been taken over by the British Bloodstock Agency, Cooper assumed the managing directorship. Already he had shown that he had a remarkable eye for a horse in 1960s, Vincent O'Brien claimed the credit for finding beneficiaries of this talent had been Raymond Guest, the former American Ambassador to Ireland. When a yearling colt by Never Say Die out of Skylarking came up at the 1960 Ballsbridge sales, Cooper made the final bid of 12,200 guineas and, under the name of Larkspur, he became the first of Vincent O'Brien's six Derby winners.

Subsequently Cooper bought a very different sort of horse for Mr Gues namely a potential steeplechaser. L'Escargot not merely carried off two Cheltenham Gold Cups but also enabled Guest to set a 20th century record as the first owner to win an Epsom Derby and an Aintree Grand National, eclipsing the feats of Dorothy Paget whose own double included a wartime substitute Derby at Newmarket with Straight Deal.

Larkspur was destined to be the first of many top performers that passed through Tom Cooper's hands en route to Vincent O'Brien's stables at

A leading article accompanying this report spoke of the Menin Gate which provided a a memorial for 58,000 who had no known graves, tying within the Ypres Salient on which for four years hung the issue of the Great War. There were four battles of Ypres with nearly 30 others grouped about them. In October, 1914, the enemy was three miles from the Gate; in May, 1918, he was two thirds of a mile away, but he never entered the city which was the gateway to the Channel Ports.

WAR MEMORIAL

In the presence of the King of the

Belgians, the British Ambassador in Brussels, Sir George Grahame, and an immense crowd, Field-Marshal

Lord Plumer today unveiled at Menin Gate the greatest of all memorials of the Great War.

The weather was brilliant, so brilliant that we were glad when at intervals light clouds drifted across the face of the sun. The monument has never been truly veiled; it is too vast for that. Only the dedicatory inscription on the central entablature above the cornice was hidden by three flags — the Union Jack flanked on either hand by the Belgian and

French flags - which constituted less a veil than a splendid touch of colour relieving the austere beauty of the allotted days ago, and loud speakers mounted in the Grande Place and along the canal bank carried voices and music to the outskirts of the great assemblage. An hour before the ceremonies began all routes to the Gate were closed except the route from the Town Hall where the

The approach to the Gate was lined with Belgian cyclist Carabiniers (Les Diables Noirs). An

Ypres band played the "Brab-anconne" as the procession passed through the gate to the space reserved on the causeway...and then the pipers of the 1st Battalion, Scots

Guards, played the lament, "The Flowers of the Forest". The pipers were posted high up above the ramparts on a wing of the Gateway, and as the lovely music floated down to us it was singularly moving. Then came a terrible moment of silence — a silence so absolute that it seemed as if the whole Salient must be standing hushed in prayer, the only sound audible being the faint click from somewhere far away of a horse's hoofs on the stones. As always, before the long minute was up it grew almost unendurable, and the crash of bugles in the Reveille came as an immense relief.

The Brahanconne was played, and then came a quite ineffaceable moment when once again the roll of British drums went out from the Menin Gate and the company sang

"God Save the King". They always make one shudder, those drums. But here, at such a place and in such surroundings, the splendour and the

Deedes rings the changes again

THE PRESS

Charles Wintour

eremy Deedes, managing director of Telegraph Newspapers, has probably been involved in moving more editorial offices than anyone managing editor of the Evening Standard, he belped to move London's evening from Shoe Lane to the Express building at 121 Fleet Street. (Linotype machines used at Shoe Lane on a Friday night had to be ready for work, with their metal pots heated, at the Express on Sunday night.) As managing editor of Eddy Shah's Today he moved the editorial staff (and equipment) into 70 Vauxhall Bridge Road. Then, in his present post, he moved the editorial staff of the Telegraph newspapers from Fleet Street to their distant outpost at 181 Marsh Wall, on the Isle of Dogs. Now, following Conrad Black's deal to take five floors in the Reichmann development at Canary Wharf, he must plan the editorial shift to half a mile north of the present offices. It should be the easiest move of the lot, since at least the editorial staff is now thoroughly accustomed to the electronic age. There will also be more room. While the present Telegraph building has six floors, each of 16,000 sq ft, plus the ground floor, which is largely given over to the entrance hall, the new offices will comprise floors seven to 11 of 28,000 sq ft each -140,000 sq ft against 112,000 sq ft. Apart from space, it is also a very good financial deal for Mr Black and all the other Telegraph shareholders (who include many members of the staff with their share options). Mr Black is believed to have sold the long lease on the original building to Olympia & York, Mr Reichmann's company, for about £25 million: what it cost four years ago. This has been achieved at a moment when office buildings in that section of the Isle of Dogs are looking distinctly unloved, with completed developments going unlet and uncompleted developments abandoned. Furthermore, if other Canary Wharf deals are anything to go by, Mr Black probably has a rent freeze for anything up to 15 years, plus a payment of millions in advance towards fitting-

Lord Hartwell, former principal proprietor and editor in chief of the Telegraph newspapers, can also feel reasonably pleased. As a small item on the City pages of his old newspaper revealed recently, he has sold half of the Berry family's remaining 12 per cent shareholding for about £26 million to Mr Black's Hollinger company, which now owns 83 per cent. The value of the whole company can be valued on this basis at more than £430 million.

But what about the journalists? Having just become adjused to one set of new offices, will they not hate the idea of moving again so soon, particularly as they will be no closer to the more civilised part of town? Although sometimes they may like to give the impression of being fire-eating radicals, always abreast of the latest trends, many of them are as resistant to change as any of their one-time neighbours, the dockers.

welcome the move with loud huzzahs, But they may come to realize that if they had stayed put, they could have been left out on a limb. All the improvements in Docklands transport will now be centred on Canary Wharf; anything further down the Light Railway, as they are at present, will have a low priority. And if the Canary Wharf project comes off they will have far more facilities in terms of eating places, shops, exercise facilities, etc, than they could ever have hoped for.

In any event morale at the Telegraph offices is quite high. Results of the recent promotion, based on Battle of Britain supplements, are said to show significant gains despite recent price in-creases. And the introduction of a Monday sports section has lifted the figure on that day by 20,000. For the first time in years a Daily Telegraph circulation figure may show an increase on the same month last year.

this should strengthen the position of the editor, Max Has-tings. Such formidable and trenchant characters as the entrepreneur Sir James Goldsmith and British Airways chairman Lord King have joined the board as non-executive directors; they are unlikely to choke back any criticisms they may nourish of editorial policies for fear of bruising sensitive temperaments. But it is my guess that Mr Black, who is beginning to enjoy his editorial responsibilities, and his deputy, Sir Frank Rogers, will ensure that board meetings do not degenerate into editorial post-mortems. In any event, Mr Hastings, a veteran of radio's Any Questions and television's Question Time, can look after himself pretty well. He has rarely been known to avoid an

The Telegraph move will start in September 1991, giving the master mover of Fleet Street plenty of time to polish up his act, and should be complete five months later. By that time the significance of the board room changes should be clear.

BBC weatherman, felt somewhat overcast recently when he drove past a poster advertisement for International Ranch Paint. The advertisement showed weather symbols and a tin of paint at the foot of a white front door. The copy read: "One coat shrugs off anything Michael Fish can throw at it."

Mr Fish was annoyed that neither International Paint, a division of Courtaulds, nor MWP, its advertising agency, had sought his permission to use his name.

He sent a letter to the agency pointing out that as a civil servant - Mr Fish is employed by the meteorological department - he is forbidden to appear in advertisements, and asking MWP to donate a £1,000 "usage fee" to charity. MWP promptly com-"How could we not?" says Paul Wilmot, the agency's creative director.

Quite easily, in fact, because what MWP did was quite legal. It would not have been allowed to use Mr Fish's name in a television commercial, as the Independent Broadcasting Authority prohibits references in television advertising to any living person without his or her permission. But the code of practice for press and poster advertisements allows grined celebrities feel they have cause for complaint, they can always, like Mr Fish, appeal to the advertiser or agency.

Failing that, they can complain to the Advertising Standards Authority (ASA), which can insist on the withdrawal of advertisements that contravene its code of practice.

According to the ASA, politicians complain the most, perhaps because they come in for the roughest treatment. For example, Derek Hatton, the former deputy leader of Liverpool city council, succeeded in obtaining a ban on references to people with "a an advertisement for BMW high degree of public expo- cars that used a newspaper sure", unless the references are cutting about his alleged plan to open a used-car showroom and asked: "Would you buy a used car from this man?". Most of the time, however, there is little that politicians or anyone else can do to prevent themselves being used, a lesson Edwina Currie, the former junior health minister, learnt the hard way when she spotted herself in a poster for Radio Rentals in spring last year. Taking advantage of the salmonella scare that had led

"There was no way

> withdraw that ad," says Frank Cokayne, Radio Rentals' marketing director.
> "She is in the public eye and therefore fair game

By contrast, Nigel Lawson, the former chancellor, has maintained a dignified silence. In the past two years he has been used in advertisements for Bupa, Trivial Pursuit and Brymon Airways which, only days after his resignation, promised travellers "the quickest way out of clear-cut rules apply to them.

"Without specific written approval, which has been granted only twice in the past decade on the occasion of the two royal weddings, the royal family cannot be used in advertising," says David Williamson, the deputy director of the ASA.

But they often are, and they do complain. A likeness of the Prince of Wales recently appeared on a poster above the new British Library, the building he has likened to the Russian politburo. He was shown, head in hands, in an advertisement for a drainage company which claimed that the reason new buildings were sprouting everywhere was its quick service. The agency was, again, MWP, which removed the poster after Buckingham Palace complained to it and the ASA.

Why bother running it in the first place? "An advertisement that is controversially withdrawn attracts far more attention than a regular campaign. That single poster received media coverage worth millions," Mr Wilmot says.

"If you ring in advance to ask permission when you want to use a celebrity, they only say no, or ask for a large fee. So usually you just stick it up and hope for the best. It generally pays off either way."

Sunday in the dark

A silence falls over two troubled titles

"I AM sorry but Andreas Whittam Smith, Peter Cole, Stephen Glover, Robert Max-well, Scott Smith, Peter Preston et al have no comment."
While both the Observer and The Sunday Times gleefully reported the battle for survival between The In-dependent on Sunday and The Sunday Correspondent, in which The Guardian holds 16 per cent, the subject was tactfully avoided by the newspapers in question, and now a determined silence is being maintained by editors and proprietors alike. At the eye of the storm is the ambitious Chicago Tribune group, whose executives are also incommunicado as they consider whether to bail out of their 17.6 per cent stake in the ailing Correspondent and instead pay at least double the £5 value of shares in the two Independent titles to take a controlling 30 per cent.

Mr Whittam Smith, the founder, editor and chief exec-utive of The Independent, is thought to be opposed in principle to the Tribune's demand that he suspend the titles' articles of association, which prevent any shareholder from owning more than 15 per cent.

However, despite his fears that a change in Independent ownership rules may lead to a bid from Robert Maxwell, the owner of the Mirror group and 10 per cent shareholder, Mr Whittam Smith is understood to have told the Tribune that it could have 30 per cent if it naid £10-£12 a share.

If the Tribune/Independen deal, which depends on The Guardian not taking over. The Sunday Correspondent or launching its own Sunday title within a year, is not successfu., the Tribune will throw its financial resources behind the Correspondent, now planning a relaunch as a quality tabloid". This could put the survival of The Independent on Sunday to the test. With speculation mounting. editors and shareholders are keeping their cards close to their chests.

James Bone reports

merican viewers of Cable News Network's nightly Newsnight programme are enjoying a unique television treat this week. After the headlines, members of the audience can call in to select what they want to watch.

Viewers telephone a special number and, for 75 cents, vote for one of six news features on the Newsnight menu. The two favourite items are shown along with about another dozen pieces during the hour-long

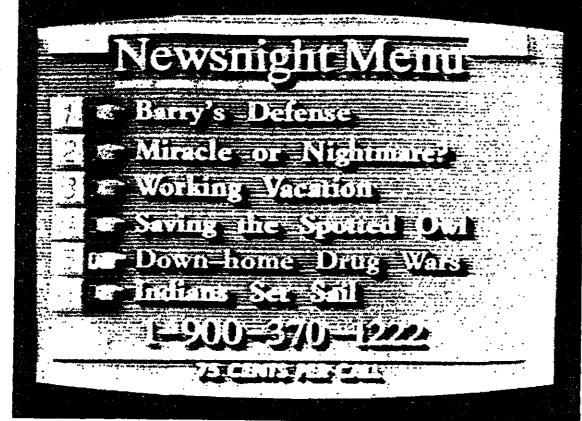

On the first night of this experiment in a primitive form of "interactive television" on Monday, the choice included pieces on the cocaine trial of Marion Barry, the mayor of Washington; a lawsuit involving a controversial antidepressant drug; summer jobs; the protection of the spotted owl; domestic marijuana cultivation; and some native Americans leaving the desert and going to sea.

Entering into the spirit, I decided that television should stick to what it does best - pretty pictures - and called to cast a vote for the owl story. Alas, other viewers had different ideas. The top choice was a downbeat feature about a New York woman suing the maker of a new anti-depressant drug that she says made her feel like committing suicide. That probably speaks volumes about the tastes of the insomniac late-night audience.
Newsnight is aired at midnight eastern time, 9pm on the west coast.

Towards the end of the programme, it became clear that the second selected feature would not show owls, either. In an equally revealing vote, the late-nighters selected the feature about home-grown marijuana. My taste for owls would have to wait for another day

And there is the rub. Local American television stations have for years asked their viewers to call in to choose the late-night movie, but the idea of extending consumer choice to news is new.

CNN's experiment, which is available in 54 million American homes, has stirred controversy about whether the station is pandering to viewers' tastes by allowing them to choose stories with the lowest common denominator. It is an issue already of importance in

Power of the press: viewers of Newsnight can select items of news from the the menu offered

'It's like a newspaper. If they do not like to read the big story, they go where they want'

Britain, where ITN has begun altering its midday news broadcasts to conform to viewers' preferences. CNN executives have no doubt that their experiment will involve no loss of editorial judgment, "You have two kinds of stories in any show, the want-to-know and the need-to-know," said Bob Furnad, senior executive of CNN. "We are still going to show people the need-

But what of those owls? Professor Leo Bogart, of New York university, and a fellow at the Gannett centre for media studies in New York, argues that the application of "interactive television" news could mean that viewers are deprived of such serendipitous encounters. You provide people only with the familiar, you give them only the expected," he said. "You lose the element of editorial judgment, you lose precisely the element of the unexpected that you want,"

The station with most experience in "interactive" news broadcasts is the French-language TeleMetropole in Montreal, which is in the forefront of new technology. Every evening, the cable channel's 25,000 subscribers can tune in to a half-hour news programme that offers them a choice of feature material. The broadcast is divided by advertisements into four segments. In the first, nine-minute portion, all viewers hear the news headlines of the day. In the second, six-minute segment, they are of-fered a choice of three items, each being broadcast simultaneously on parallel channels available to them at a zap of their remote control. One might be an interview, a second an item on sports and a third a replay of the news headlines for those who switched on late. A similar threepronged choice - this time including a local news story, an international news story and, say, an arts piece - is offered in each of the two remaining four-minute

The logic is that, with people increasingly switching channels if they get bored, you stand a better chance of keeping viewers if you offer them a choice within a single broadcast "Everybody is zapping these days," said Gerard Pau, an editor on Tele-Metropole news. "We want them to be zapping to our signal." The most popular items are the sports, international and the local news stories, M Pau said. Like Mr Furnad of CNN, M Pau defends the use of technology to offer viewers a choice, "It's like a newspaper. If they do not like to read the big story, they go where they want. We do the same thing." American television, having a more competitive history than the British industry, is more sophisticated in assessing what news interests people. Market surveys have long been a staple of local

The Times/Mirror centre for the people and the press, a media thinktank run by the owners of the Los Angeles Times, now makes such information public by conducting a monthly survey of which stories have most interested the public.

Among its often disconcerting re sults is the fact that four times as many Americans know that Presi dent Bush does not like broccoli, the subject of some controversy with broccoli farmers earlier this year, than the name of General Colin Powell, who heads the US armed

"Our experience indicates that people are interested in human stories, stories that impact on their own lives," said Donald Kellermann, the director of the centre. "If you are interested in human stories, you are going to be interested in Tiananmen Square or an airplane crash. The problem is that, once the students are attacked in Tiananmen Square, you are no longer interested in the political fallout."

The only near equivalent in Britain is the "Appreciation Index" of both BBC and ITV programmes, including news broadcasts, pre-pared by the BBC Broadcasting Research Unit for the Broadcasting Audience Research Board. But the figures are vague. As competition in the news market heats up, however, ITN has begun following American practices and conducting market

ITN's News at One was the first programme where viewer reaction was properly studied, beginning about two years ago, according to Huw Roberts, an ITN spokesman. The broadcast had suffered from a scheduling change that placed it at 12.30. To win back audiences, ITN conducted research into what kind of viewers were watching. ITN found that the audience was comprised largely of mothers at home with their children and elderly people, and provided an appropriate diet of news features. One special geared to the News at One audience, for example, dealt with the plight of orphans in Romania. The result was a rapid recovery in the ratings.

ITN's market research had been criticised by Ian Hargreaves, head of news and current affairs at the BBC, but Mr Roberts dismisses any idea that it will lead to editors simply choosing the news stories that most appeal to the audience.

"You do not ignore the day's news," he said. "You cannot do that. You are a news programme. We still stick with the whole news agenda of the day We are just talking about things we add to the programme - other elements." Asked it the principle of consumer choice might eventually be extended to the news itself, he said: 'That sounds like Hughie Green. The clapometer on the news. I do not think we are stepping even one millionth of an inch in that direction.

Is Big Brother listening in?

Methods of controlling the output of new radio stations may have to become positively Orwellian if they are to work nother magical after-A noon is underway on Snooze FM. Soothing sounds wast from the mixing desk and your DJ is preparing his next link. Then, suddenly, there is a rumpus at the door, shouts are heard and men in grey uniforms appear.

The men are the Radio Authority's dreaded Format Police, responding to a public complaint that Snooze is operating outside its franchise. They seize material to find out if this really is the "melodic easy listening" the station's contract requires.

Something akin to this Orwellian nightmare is being predicted as the likely result of the policies of the Indepen-dent Broadcasting Authority (IBA) and its successor, from January I, the Radio Authority (RA).

They foresee the creation of two shadowy figures central to the brave new world of UK radio: the "format police-man", who will enforce the RA's decisions on which stations will be allowed to play what kinds of music, and the "format judiciary" which will listen to a stations' output and decide whether it conforms to the station's mandate.

"Stations will have to keep tapes for 42 days," says Paul Brown, the IBA's head of radio programming. In the event of public complaint the RA will investigate.

In practice, of course, the regulation officers will most often be called in by rival stations responding to what they see as infringement of their own territories. Like those that have already started in London, each of the new stations (30 will be added every year for the next five years), will have to sign a promise of performance, which sets out the sort of programmes they have won the franchise to broadcast. Most people agree that there will be more stations than the market can support. To prevent a mass, commercially driven migration towards lowest common denominator broadcasting, the set-up has to be regulated.

The Broadcasting Bill gives the RA a range of penalties to use for enforcement, with the ultimate sanction being the removal of a franchise. The difficulty is that judgments will be subjective.

For example, London's Jazz FM has already been the subject of complaints concerning its format. Jazz has a promise of performance that lists "Big band music, vocal or instrumental standards, Latin American, traditional Jazz, Afro America, freeform and all other forms of music that can be said to be influenced by jazz or that have been in-strumental in its evolution".

"Jazz will be keeping well within the promise of performance," says Jonathan Abbot, the company's head of corpo-rate communications. "But there's no Berlin Wall. Melody [another new London station] plays Ella Fitzgerald and Kiss a dance music station due to start broadcasting in September] will also be at our hat will happen if Melody discovers that Ella Fitzgerald is good for its ratings and starts offering more of the same? After all, Melody's IBA remit is for easy-listening music, defined as "melodic chart hits, popular standards, big band music, classical music, light opera and musicals". Jazz would have to defend its territory. Either that, or the RA would have to accept blurring of the divisions, and the erosion of its policy of enforcing diversity.

Kiss has a promise with percentages written into it. Fifty per cent of music played every peak time hour will have to be new material that has not yet reached the UK charts. The records will be anything dance-orientated: "Rap, reggae, hip hop, house, jazz, garage or soul," says Anita Mackie, the Kiss public relations officer.

"What is garage?" I ask She consults a colleague and they decide on "Soulful house". decline to ask them what "house" is. Let us hope the RA's regulation officers are not as bashful.

LIFE AND TIMES

Daughter of the revolution

Galina Semenova is a voice for the new Soviet woman. Now, Mary Dejevsky reports, she will take her message into government

Semenova was as surprised as anyone else when, ten days ago, she became the Soviet Union's highest-ranking woman politician, having been elected to the central committee of the Soviet Communist party, to the politburo and to the secretariat all in one go.

Ms Semenova, aged 53, has never been a professional politician. She is the exuberant editorin-chief of one of the Soviet Union's highest circulation magazines, a glossy monthly (glossy, that is, within the quality limits of Soviet paper and colour reproduction) called Krestyanka (Peasant Woman), targeted at women in rural areas. With a print run of 22 million, the magazine has made a name for itself by rolling back the frontiers of what can be said to female readers, and how it should

Last month's issue published pictures of elderly people in a village which was destined to die because it was being deserted by its young; an article about adoption (a relatively new phenom-Vasilevna enon in the Soviet Union); keepfit articles; dress patterns; recipes, taking into account the meagre buying possibilities in rural areas; an article on palmistry; another on the interpretation of dreams and the latest abridged instalment of "How to Win Friends and In-fluence People", from the book by Dale Camegie.

This last is not something that Ms Semenova needs to learn. She is one of life's great enthusiasts. Sitting behind her editor's desk in a modest office on the sixth floor of a crumbling high-rise block, she speaks of her pride at having reached the editor's chair "step by step", without help from anyone. Most of all, she is proud that she has just become one of the first two Moscow editors to be elected her staff under the new publishing regulations. She is genuinely sorry to be leaving Krestyanka after nearly nine years, but her work in the party secretariat, the politburo - in which she will hold the new women's affairs portfolio - her position as a parliamentary deputy (nominated by the Soviet women's committee) ship of the committee on economic reform) will leave her no time for editing.

The magazine set up a scheme to help unhappy women in cities move to rural areas, where there was a shortage of women and Ms Semenova beams as she recalls how many marriages have re-sulted, and, "how many villages have been rejuvenated by the women we have helped to send". Ms Semenova would probably like her motto to be: "From words to deeds." This is why she is taking the plunge into full-time politics. When I ask myself, 'Why me?', I think of the magazine and the fact that we managed to achieve something . . . I really want to do something for women, to do real, specific work, in parliament, in education and at the local level. We especially need to prepare women for the market economy. It is so important that women do not suffer. Why is it that Soviet women have fared so badly, despite all the promises of the early years of Soviet power? The problem starts at school, she says, where girls develop a sense of inferiority. This pushes them either to extreme shyness or to outbursts of extreme emotions, and this just repels people," None the less, she insists: "My position is that there are no women's problems, there role played by journalism. "Of are problems of society as a course, I find it intimidating. But I whole." If she had been asked to join the political mainstream nine years ago, she says, she would probably have refused. The grandeur of the position would have been too intimidating," she says.

"Now, it is completely different. The party is going through difficult times. But it has stated its intention of becoming a party of civil consent to co-operate with all public organisations ... " Again, her tone becomes emotional: "In my opinion, women were created by nature herself to bring peace." She considers her elevation to be a recognition of both the Soviet women's movement and of the am reassured by the fact that the magazine has 22 million readers, a little more than the whole membership of the Soviet Communist party." Like so many members of Mr Corbachev's team, she is a child of the Khrushchev generation, and remembers the gradual sense of liberation of the late Fifties and Although a Russian, she was brought up in the Ukraine and can speak and write Ukrainian. After university, she went to work in the Ukrainian port city of Odessa, before moving to Moscow and a senior post with a party youth magazine. But what about the "years of stagnation" (no one refers to "the Brezhnev years" any more)? Did she have a patron or a protector? "No," she says, very definitely. Then, more thoughtfully: "We were protected by our positions. I am proud that we had those positions. That is what helped us to reject diktat and to reject orders that were not to our liking. The fact that our readers were women also protected us to a

Ms Semenova is, like many high-flying Soviet women, utterly feminine in her dress and manner. They tend to wear pastel dresses with lace collars, and have their hair in softly flowing locks (Ms Semenova kept keeps hers tied back behind large earrings). She modulates her voice in a way characteristic of Russian women in public life, pausing and lowering her tone for emotional effect. The feeling is genuine, not affected, but she has her set phrases and her little speeches. You can easily imagine her addressing committee meetings and women's seminars; she has already travelled to Britain and to the United States in women's delegations with leaders and other individuals whose behaviour surprised me."

Pressed to say why she has risen to the top when other women have found it so difficult, she pays tribute to her mother and to her close-knit family. Her late father was a military man, and the family moved from posting to posting

when she was a child. She has two brothers, a son, one grandson, and a husband who has just left the official press to work in a consortium on a new publication called Business World

In the west, Ms Semenova would probably be described as post-feminist. She insists that women should be allowed to choose for themselves whether to pursue a career or stay at home. She regrets the current trend in the Soviet Union to drag anyone and everyone into political life. "There are some people who thrive on political meetings and demonstrations, but there are others who are never happier than when curted up with a book. Similarly, there are women who derive more than enough spiritual satisfaction from life with their husband and children." Ms Semenova has been a member of the Communist party for 25 years. At a time when senior figures are starting to leave the party, had she ever considered following them? "No, never," she says categorically. Then, after a pause, "There were difficult moments, but they were not connected with the party as such but with leaders and other individuals whose behaviour surprised me,

Now, she says she would consider berself to be politically somewhere between Mr Gorbachev and Boris Yeltsin She admires Mr Yeltsin's boldness and courage, and regrets his decision to leave the party. At least, she says — as though trying to reassure herself — he left for common human values, not for political reasons". Gorbachev, whom she does not know personally, she says: "I am always amazed above all by his acute sense of the public mood.*

Ms Semenova, too, gives the impression of feeling at least something of what they feel." But the disapproving silence which greeted Mr Gorbachev's insistence at the recent party congress that there should be more women in the Soviet leadership suggests that hers will be a lone voice in a very

n the early weeks of be-wildered new motherhood, Helen Franks recalls a day when Hannah, her first-born. had been "particularly ratty". When her husband arrived home she thrust the wailing bundle into his arms and told him: "You have her. I'm going." She got as far as the front door. That was the only time she ever contemplated leaving her children. In the 28 years since, she has remained bound to Hannah and her sister and brother by what she calls passionate commitment.

The feeling is shared by most mothers and is endorsed by society to the extent that it away as downright wicked. Mrs Franks to some extent shared the view when she began researching her new book, Mummy Doesn't Live Here Any More. "I started out half expecting to find unnatural women committing unnatural acts. But it's not as simple as that," she says. There are an estimated 80,000 mothers in this country living apart from their children and their numbers are on the increase. In the United

of a passionate love affair. But not all affairs are on a grand scale, and in some cases there is no other man. The woman might leave as part of her quest for self-fulfilment regards mothers who walk and it is this trend that Mrs Franks finds especially sents a real shift in behaviour.

"What they are demonstrating is conditional mothering, in the way that modern man riage may be conditional. If the experience doesn't provide satisfaction, then they decide to pack it in and try something else, preferably with high status, autonomy and financial independence, or other things that motherhood does not supply. Men have always had

She followed her book re-

Classical rock is popping up again

As yet another bid is made to marry rock and classical music, David Toop looks at previous, unsuccessful attempts

ith Luciano Pavarotti and Nigel Kennedy recently bestriding the pop charts like Goliath and David, the times are clearly propitious for another stab at classical rock. Thanks to records such as the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra's Hooked on Classics, few categories of human endeavour have been so derided; are ambitions to marry these two artistic worlds as doomed as the alchemist's quest, or is there hope of an imminent union? Composer Jonathan Warner. along with other ex-students of London's Morley College, feels sufficiently optimistic to launch a brief season of concerts to address this theme. "Seven Days in May", a deceptive title if ever there wa one, is a three-day festival this week which Warner hopes will bring together the best elements of rock and classical music. Errollyn Warren, Michael Hobbs, Emily Burridge and other electro-acoustic composers, including Warner himself, will present works which, in the quaintly-worded claim of those mounting the event, will "cut across the snobbism and divisions inherent in these different areas of music".

"In the area of classical music." says Warner, "the way it is presented is very sober." People attend concerts at the Wigmore Hall, he maintains, simply to be seen. Sobriety, formality, lack of intensity: the lack of Dionysiac excess in concert-going has plainly reached criminal proportions. Rock gigs possess the visceral qualities such demure occasions lack, Warner believes, but the squalid uncertainties that threaten rock fans during an evening's entertainment stray too far in the other direction.

if comfortable surroundings, impeccable amplification, thoughtful visual presentation and beer glasses made from glass rather than plastic are the answer to our musical malaise, then the "Seven Days In May" festival will achieve its aims. But what are those aims, exactly? "I hope we can educate some people away from the charts," says Warner.

Such sentiments may ring bells for campaigners ancient enough to remember the so-called progressive era of rock. In the early 1970s, groups such as Barclay James Harvest, Emerson Lake & Palmer and Yes spurned the lower depths of pop success and gathered at the foothills of lofty peaks once scaled by Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninov and Liberace. This was the age of proliferating keyboards. Keith instrument to instrument in his attempt to capture the orchestral sweep of Mussorgsky. Only punk, with its celebration of incompetence, finally halted a distressing trend.

Unfortunately, the tendency is deep-rooted. Even in the primitive dawn of pop, dead composers unwittingly loaned their art to its strident emergence. In 1962, Kim Fowley, working under the guise of a group called B. Bumble & The Stingers, reconstructed the works of Grieg, Brahms, Rossini and Tchaikovsky under titles such as "Dawn Cracker", "Apple Knocker", "Baby Mash" and

'Nut Rocker". History has preserved the name, though not the music, of the New York Rock & Roll Ensemble. According to the Dictionary of 20th Century Music, the NYRRE proclaimed rock to be a "kind of 20th-century chamber music". This delightful vein of misapprehension continues with the dictionary's belief that "the Beatles studied Luciano Berio, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Ravi Shankar and others." True enough, George Harrison did release his own album of electronic music during the heady, indulgent days of Apple, but the value of this artefact is more keenly appreciated by collectors of recorded obscurities than by stu-

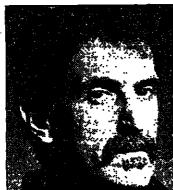

fusion of both the sublime and ridiculous achievements of 20thcentury music do exist. Frank Zappa has combined rhythm 'n' blues and a taste for scatological absurdism, with influences from Messiaen, Varese and Conlan Nancarrow. The classical music world has not greeted his efforts with open arms. As a witness to the Frank Zappa and The Mothers of Invention concert at the Royal Albert Hall in 1967, I recall the orchestral musicians employed to play Zappa's "serious" music approaching their task with a self-defeating display of flippancy.

Rock musicians dedicated to a Difficult economic times demand a more pragmatic view of popular music. Just as Hooked on Classics rescued the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra from what seemed at the time like approaching demise, so the Kronos Quartet, Michael Nyman and, more recently, the London Chamber Orchestra with their "rock" stagings of classical string music, have saved themselves from a career of ill-attended arts centre concerts by using rock presenta-tion. The beliefs of Jonathan Warner are commonly held, its seems. "There's just good and bad music," he says. "Not good or bad genres. It would be great if you could have it altogether. It's all good stuff.

DANCE: INTERVIEW

We won't dance, don't ask us

Two of the Royal Ballet's young stars, Maria Almeida and Jonathan Cope, are retiring from dance. Debra Craine reports fter eight years of being groomed for stardom with the Royal Ballet, Jonathan Cope and Maria Almeida are packing away their dancing shoes. The two young principal artists, approaching the best performing years of their lives, have decided to retire from dance altogether while still in their twenties, because they want to lead a normal life. Tonight, Almeida and Cope dance Swan Lake for the last

A couple off stage as well as on. they were among the Royal Ballet's brightest hopes for the future. Almeida, 25, was favoured by the choreographers Sir Frederick Ashton and Sir Kenneth MacMillan for her superb technique, her beautiful lines and her sensitive musicality. At 27, Cope was the company's leading male dancer, his elegant height and strong physique making him the chosen partner of almost every ballerina of the past four years (although his height also made him an inappropriate partner for the tiny Almeida). But such success fulfilled neither of them as performers, and now they are eager to escape the demanding world of classical ballet.

"I'm just fed up with the ritual of dancing, of keeping in constant good shape, always being fit," says Cope, who has had operations on both legs to relieve the tight muscle sheath in his shins. People see ballet as glamorous. They see the applause and the flowers. But it's not glamorous. it's bloody hard, and nobody understands that."

While Cope's problem is the gruelling physical stress of ballet, Almeida's is the mental toll it exacts on her. "I'm constantly bringing myself down. I'm never satisfied with what I do, and I'm just sick and tired of being depressed every time I do something and never getting any satisfaction." Last year, ill health and a dramatic weight loss forced her to take four months off. "I lost weight because I was unhappy."
The departure of Cope and

Almeida will be felt by the Royal, which will be hard hit by the loss of its leading male dancer and regular partner of Sylvie Guillem, although the arrival of Irek Mukhamedov from the Bolshoi will go some way to bolstering the company's male strength.

Strangely, for two people possessed of such beautiful physiques and assured techniques, neither Cope nor Almeida has been happy as a dancer. At six-foot-one, Cope feels his height is a disadvantage; it made him a natural as a danseur noble, but prevented him becoming the type of dancer he wanted to be. "I don't think tall people can do as many tricks as small people because small dancers can turn and jump and beat. I think they can be much more exciting. always wanted to be small and be able to do all the tricks, because I've always been more interested in the gymnastic side of dancing."

The Devon-born dancer regrets that he did not get the chance to act in character parts. "I was always the prince, always the hero, and I would have liked to play the villain. A prince is a prince, especially in the classics. He comes on and grins and looks sad, and then he does a bigger grin at the end and that's it.'

Almeida, who thinks she does not have "a big enough ego" for ballet, did not want to be a dancer in the first place. Born in Luanda, Angola, of Portuguese parents, she ended up at the Royal Ballet School at the age of 10 partly because "We had to find a school in London where English wasn't quite that important." Urged on by her parents and her teachers, she reluctantly pursued dancing as a profession, joining the Royal Ballet in 1982.

"Everyone was so proud. You get trapped. I did it mostly to please my parents." Not surprisingly, her decision to retire prematurely has disappointed them. 'I think they're devastated. I think they have tried to understand but it has hurt them a lot."

Almeida, whose repertoire includes Giselle, Manon, Juliet, Cinderella and the Sleeping Beauty, admits to being "amazed at what I've achieved, amazed at how far I've gone". Yet she dismisses some of the critical raves she received as "ridiculous. I think I probably got better than I deserved." Once the Royal's youngest principal dancer, she says she did not seek the spotlight she was thrust under, a spotlight especially harsh when she was chosen by Sir Frederick Ashton for the revival of his Ondine, previously almost exclusively associated with Margot Fonteyn.

Now is the right time to go. "It gets to a point where you can't cope anymore, and you've really had enough. I've been thinking about it for such a long time, and I think that eventually you get too old to go into something different."

Tonight will be Almeida's Covent Garden farewell (Cope is dancing in David Bintley's The Planets in August) but neither of them seems worried that they will miss performing. Do they ever see themselves on stage again? For Almeida, the prospect is most unlikely. But Cope is less certain. "I do like the theatre and if I could perform in something which was rewarding but didn'i kill me, I could handle that." It is not easy for dancers to retire. A lifetime of training has prepared them for little else and, unlike professional sport, the monetary rewards are not great. Because they are 100 young and have not been dancing long enough, Cope and Almeida do not qualify for financial aid from the Dancers' Resettlement Fund.

By leaving the profession so soon, they are hoping to start again while they are still young. Their plans are vague — "We are going to do nothing for six months and then decide," he says. But most of all, they are looking forward to a normal life - skiing, horseback riding and, according to Cope, "eating what you want, when you want".

Eventually, they would like to run their own business and some day have a family. "We'd quite like to have nothing to do with dance," adds Cope. "And if things go well, we won't have to."

TRUTH is not only stranger than fiction, it usually makes for better television, especially when concerned with money or murder. While drama lumbered into the summer with Granada's Made In Heaven, a series which will need to improve drastically on its blandly underwritten and badly overplayed opener about the tribula-tions of a wedding-planning agency, the two great thrillers of last night were A Whale of a Mess (Channel 4) and Viewpoint 90

Taking its title from President Bush's description of the collapse of the American Savings and Loan industry, A Whale of a Mess was the first British documentary to tell in precise and chronological detail the up-to-the-minute story of the greatest financial scandal in American history, one which has thus far only been described by television in jigsaw fashion as cach piece of the puzzle fell into the economic pit. What Diarmuid Jeffreys and his reporter Dermot Murnaghan realised was that here could be found the classic American scam, much of it set, suitably enough, in JR's home town, Dallas, Savings

But then came the de-regulation of 1982, which will eventually cost the American taxpayer $750 billion (£41.9 billion) in defaulted loans.

Along the way, carpetbagging heavies resembling Broderick Crawford on a bad day arrived in small towns, artificially inflated house properties by a novel technique known as the land-flip, laundered the money and vanished beyond the horizon, leaving a Washington investigator in daily fear of his life and a Senate apparently so deeply corrupt that even its ethics investigation has thus far been unable to bring itself

Romeo and Juliet

YOU can see why Kenneth Mac-

Millan picked out Robert Hill for advancement within American

Ballet Theatre when mounting his productions there. Tall, lean and eager, he performs excellent pir-ouettes and has a good line in the full stretch of his arabesque, although less so in intermediate positions and during some quick movements. He was first seen in Britain as a guest with Scottish

Ballet in Giselle, a couple of years of maidenheads, occasionally of both. The impression left was of loud, excited bashing. It was also of confusion.

Perhaps Freeman was the victim of his own fidelity, his determination to pack in as much episodic Malory as possible. Morgan la Fay's plots came across clearly enough, one of them ending with the death of an acolyte, spectacularly writhing in a poisoned cloak bathed in red light. Arthur's war against Rome, culminating in his crowning by the Pope as emperor of the world, was acceptably succinct. However, the tale of Balin and Balan, brothers who kill each other, was so cursorily told that it might as well have been cut. And it must have been hard for anyone unfamiliar with Malory to follow the overlapping tales of Gawain, Tor and Pellinor, quaintly in pursuit of a hind, a dog many could not accept was that.

Tippett was less concerned with being up to date in his use of imagery and language than simply with conveying his message in vivid terms. Hippies might have

The generally admiring reaction more willing to embrace the instruments of his unique theatre.

Yet the story of The ice Break is that scene comes at the death of humanistic version of the Geronthe part, but the manner of his acting tends to be conventional and is made to look all the more so by Durante's exceptionally vivid

The rough-theatre style did not altogether help. Camelot, and everywhere else, consisted of a lot of steel piping, plus a round table on which actors and actresses disported, like midgets on a

The performers swapped roles and even gender with bewildering speed, sometimes further confusing things by covering their faces with bandages. Fights were well enough evoked by the whirling of staves or banging of swords, to the sound of oriental clunks offstage; decapitation, less satisfactorily, became a mere slump of the shoulders and brandishing of a death mask.

Removal to the church improved matters, though the narrative switched pretty rapidly from steel-tube platform to steeltube tower. That was largely because we had our stylistic bearings, and the action was more focused. Out went peripheral knights with incomprehensible names, and in came finer figures. Jacques Bourgaux's woebegone Launcelot took time off from heroic deeds to sleep with Lucinda Galloway's Elaine, under the improbable impression that this feisty brunette was Katharine Rogers' sedate, blond Guinevere. Mark Lewis Jones's Tristram and Belinda Davison's Isoud brought plenty of fire to the torrid twists of their pre-Wagnerian affair.

It all ended an hour short of midnight, halfway through Malory. Next time brings Percival and Galahad, more Launcelot, and the death of Robert Swann's scrawny, balding but undeniably vivid Ar-thur. That will be the time to assess the tenor and success of Freeman's enterprise as a whole.

Clarey), for the long-suffering mother and wife Nadia (the strong-voiced, passionate Heather Harper) as she dies, for David Wilson-Johnson's powerfully reflective Lev as he thinks about his past in exile and about his son Yuri's unkind accusation that he has "flunked the struggle".

If the opera has a fault, it is that the social issues it deals with threaten the prominence of personal ones. The progress of Yuri (Sanford Sylvan, vibrantly impetuous and angry until his symbolic rebirth from a plaster cast) from unthinking racial hatred to a realisation that love is something to be sought and nurtured, not rejected, is surely the crucial theme of The Ice Break. Here, perhaps only because the work was not staged, it did not seem. deeply enough investigated.

was all applied, rather than used to colour the character from within.

For performances that moved in Durante's sphere, you had to look to the men in the other leading roles. Bruce Sansom's passionate Benvolio is reminiscent of the young Anthony Dowell (the role's originator) in the quickness and intensity of his anger when Mercutio receives his fatal wound. Guy Niblett's Tybalt is equally outstanding, icily pursuing his vendetta against Romeo.

The big orchestra introduced by Bernard Haitink continues to spill over from the pit to the stalls circle, but it does not sound as spacious in texture nor as lucid under Richard Bernas.

Thames News and weather 10.35 Disappearing World: The Trobriand Islanders of Papua New

● For once Granada's long-running is very far from disappearing. Shots of bare-breasted natives padding through the jungle of Papus Ne Guinea prepare us for the standard scenario of an ancient tribe under threat from the modern world, but the culture of the Trobriand islanders seams remarkably resident. David Watson's film promises "a story of women and wealth and money and women and wealth and money and power". If this makes it sound like an American soap opera nothing could be turther from the world of Dynasty and Dallas. Instead we are shown a primitive economy in which yarns and banana leaves pass as currency and an etaborate mourning ritual based on the non-western assumption that the way to display power is to give away wealth. The villagers have even retained their traditional belief in magic against the challenge of Christian fundamentalism. Should Disappearing World be stuck for a subject in 10 years time it is a fair bet that the Trobriand islanders will still be around to provide one. (Oracle)

Max Wall: in his comic element (9.00pm)

9.00 An Evening with Max Wall.

• Max Wall ended his days living modestly in a council house and his private life was often a mess but when he died in May his professione reputation had rarely been higher. A generation far too young to have known the music-hall in its prime could recognise Max as one of its tast great exponents, a natural droil and a brilliant mime with the music-hall comedian's cuft of being able to "play" an audience. He was, too, an accomplished straight actor, who played John Osborne's entertainer and Samuel Beckett's Krapp with equal facility. But the essence of Max is show. In one its first commis Channel 4 had him recorded at the Garrick Theatre in 1981, It is not the same as being at a live performance but now that he has gone it is probably the next best thing. The film is being repeated in his memory. 10.00 Film: Caroline? (1989) starring

By SHEILA GUNN POLITICAL REPORTER

BATHERS on many British beaches risk contracting inflammation of the ear, nose and throat, stomach upsets and skin troubles according to a parliamentary report published yesterday.

Warning signs should be put up on polluted beaches which fail to comply with EC standards, and all sewage should be properly treated and disinfected before it is discharged into the sea, the Commons environment committee rec-

Presenting the Pollution of Beaches report at Westminster yesterday the chairman Sir Hugh Rossi said that parents should look for tell-tale signs of sewage pollution such as concentrated flocks of seagulls before letting their children into the water. But he dismissed as minimal the threat of outbreaks of serious diseases from polluted waters.

More than one-fifth of the sewage discharged into the sea is not treated. The report congratulates Chris Patten, the environment secretary, for announcing that Britain will no longer dump raw sewage into the sea after 1998.

The MPs blame successive governments for being too slow to clean up the beaches which are visited annually by 18 million Britons and three million foreigners. "Although not alone in this even in Europe Britain's reputation abroad has been damaged and this has led to a lack of public confidence in government policy."

Questioned in the Commons over dirty beaches the prime minister said that the former Labour administration did nothing to comply with the EC directive signed in 1975. She cited the £3 billion clean-up programme ann-ounced by Mr Patten to bring all British beaches up to EC standards.

But the committee says that more research is needed into the health risks from swimming in polluted waters, after receiving anecdotal evidence of infections among swimmers, sailors and windsurfers off resorts which continue to fail EC standards, particularly Blackpool.

The government's previous policy of building long outfalls to carry raw sewage out to sea does not eliminate the health risks, the report concludes, "It became increasingly clear to us as our enquiry progressed that the public had lost confidence both in the water authorities proposing the schemes and the treatment of sewage by discharging into the sea regardless of the length of the outfall."

Political sketch

Faith, hope and fiscal probity

minster yesterday would have been well advised to block his ears to the ritual exchanges of abuse at prime: mmister's question time, ignore the yap and howl of royalist and anti-royalist as new arrangements for the Queen's civil list were announced, and wait for what followed. Such an onlooker. would have escaped the illnatured wrangles of a hot July afternoon, and been accorded instead a cool glimpse of the political future.

John Smith, John Major and Neil Kinnock were engaged in a three-sided battle of wits. Major won, but not without a fight a clean one, for it was all in the best possible taste. Voices were not raised: yet this was in John Smith had made his usual effective speech decrying the government's management of the economy. The presentation was - as is the prerogative of shadow chancellors - heavy on scorn and light on alternative sugges-tions. But somehow Mr Smith's very presence is an answer to the thought that there might be anything risky about Labour. In sculpture I believe the three Virtues take feminine form but if, to Faith, Hope and Charity we were to add Probity, then a statue of the tubby figure of Mr. Smith (draped modestly with a Commons order paper) would be an adornment to any gallery.

John Major had begun his customary reply. It was - as is the prerogative of chan-cellors — light on self-criti-cism and heavy on mock calls for the Opposition's elusive policies.

As a dispatch box performer, Major is developing real class. His woodenness has gone and he bobs around the ring with poise and confidence, appearing to relish the fight. What a ringside spectator respects in him is that (unlike Mrs Thatcher and Mr Kinnock) he seldom gives less at the dispatch box than the argument rationally requires. What historians will respect is that he never gives more. I-owe to The Guardian's Edward Pearce the aside that "John Major has neverbeen known to hold an unnecessary opinion."
Yesterday, Mr Major had.

Were they, asked Major? He had consulted the records He had found Mr Kinnock's own words: "This is a time for judgment, and that judg

He had found Bryan Gould's remarks, and they echoed Mr Kinnock's He had researched further and found what Smith himself "that pillar of fiscal rectitude, had recommended, in Paris: "a stimulation of the economy by cuts in interest rates". The following day, in Audite. Smith had summarised: Now is the time for

Major offered to go furthe He would offer a prize to anybody who could discove any; ose by any Labour

John Smith rose to inter-mpt Labour had opposed tax cuts, he said. That was the steady, steady, part about it. This was the hardest argu-ment Major had to answer, so, with all the greater feigner considence, he declared that tax cuts had nothing to do with it. It was the lower interest rates that had caused inflation. In fact, he con-chuted Labour's claim to the steady steady banner was "fiction, fiction."

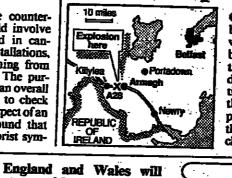

Neil Kinnock looked temp ted to join the fray Major goaded him to do so. Finally, to a hurrall from the Tories, the leader of the Opposition rose. Mr Kinnock made his nimhie best of impossible circumstances. Was the chancellor now saying that his predecessor, Mr Lawson, had ignoted the warning signs when he cut interest rates? As for Mr Kinnock's own remarks about cheaper borrowing that was our policy for stability, steadiness, and production."-"Ahl" said Major, "More flights THE Irish Republic's national airline, Aer Lingus, lost nearly £10 million on flights last year despite an increase in passenger and tourist traffic.

Steep rises in fuel and landing costs, allied to intense competition that held down ticket prices on the London Dublin route, helped to wipe out profits recorded in 1988, the airline's annual meeting was told yesterday. The reversal could force up Aer Lingus flight prices soon, air industry observers in Dublin believe.

Overall pre-tax profits last year totalled £33 million down £2 million. Ancilliary activities, including an hotel chain mainly in Europe, were the main source of revenue, with aircrast maintenance and traffic handling also reporting big increases in business.

Blacks Leisure falls by 64%

Blacks Leisure, the sports and fashion retailer that warned in April that results for the year to March 3 would be much below expectations, has announced pre-tax profits 64 per cent down at £1.08 million.

Sales rose from £47.8 million to £53.8 million and the interest payment has doubled to £1.59 million, representing gearing of 150 per cent. There is an extraordinary debit of £541,000 and retained profit for the year is £42,000, compared with £1.51 million. Earnings per share fell from 12p to 3.83p, and there is no final dividend. The results for the year to end-February 1989 have been restated and profits attributable to shareholders reduced by £167,000.

Tempus, page 25 Aitken revival

Aitken Hume, the financial services group, has returned to profits with £2.21 million pretax figure for the year to end-March, compared with a loss of £1.37 million. The dividend is 1p, up from 0.5p last year. The figures were, however, hit by a £1.29 million write-off on or company in any privatised an American junk bond investment, and a £230,000 cent. Airline loses Clawback plan for power property sales of the government's plans for privatising the power industry, selling the companies to industrial conglomerates such as Hanson or overseas utilities was a counsel of desperation.

By MARTIN WALLER

THE government is devi- from being a logical extension sing a clawback system for a tender sale of Power-Gen or National Power, the bigger electricity generator, to prevent a repetition of the Royal Ordnance and Rover affairs, when large amounts of property assets were sold at knock-down prices.

Under the system envisaged, the generators would have to give the taxpayer half of any surplus on a site's historical cost from a future sale. This does not take account of sites developed and held for their prospective income.

Institutions have told the government's advisers they would be unwilling to accept any sort of clawback of property profits after an eventual float of the generators.

They felt the volatility of the businesses, emphasised in every study of the industry by analysts, meant the generators nceded an assured income stream from property to be attractive to investors. The City sources said that far possible bid from Hanson,

Labour 'would limit buyer to 15% stake'

By DEREK HARRIS, INDUSTRIAL EDITOR

JOHN Wakeham, the energy secretary, ran into a double-barrelled attack from the Labour party and trade unions on share stake ceilings for Pow-erGen, the electricity producer which may be sold to the Hanson group or some other private company. two electricity producers

If returned to power, Labour would force any company which had acquired PowerGen to divest all but 15 per cent of its holding, Frank Dobson, the shadow energy secretary, said in a letter to Mr Wakeham.

In doing so, Labour would be honouring a Tory promise, argued Mr Dobson. Cecil Parkinson, when energy secretary, told the Commons energy committee that the government intended limiting any holding by an individual electricity company to 15 per Dobson accused Mr flotation.

Wakeham of going back on Mr Parkinson's undertaking. Power trade union representatives saw Mr Wakeham the day after reports of Lord Hanson's showing a "firm' interest in a purchase of PowerGen, the smaller of the

which are to be privatised. They told Mr Wakeham that to allow any company to hold more than 15 per cent was "a breach of faith with the public and employees".

John Lyons, secretary of the Electricity Supply Trade Union Council, said he believed Mr Wakeham's contemplating a sale of PowerGen to a single company showed what difficulties the government was in over its electricity privatisation programme. Mr Wakeham, he said, was unable to throw any more light on how PowerGen workflotation of PowerGen. Mr made if there was a public therefore, serves a dual function. At the least it attributes some clear value to the two companies, even if the bid or another tender sale does not eventually go ahead.

A bid also strengthens the government's hand in the wrangling over the companies' capital structures. Talks between the energy department and PowerGen are thought to have broken down, in part over demands for an injection of cash to control sulphur dioxide emission

The department is working to a deadline in attempting to settle its plans for the companies. City sources believe any deal must be finalised in time for the autumn sale of the 12 regional distribution companies or the inevitable uncertainty will reduce the final price. Another bidder could delay the sale, say analysts.

A clawback system was put in place for the water privatisation last year to ensure that a share of any windfall property gains went to the taxpayer or consumer. But such a system would not transfer directly to the generators, which own huge and potentially valuable assets in the form of decommissioned power stations, because it was initially tied to the amount the water companies could charge their customers. There is no price regulation in the generating industry.

The City regards the government as walking any number of political tightropes as it seeks to sell the generators. It has to decide, for example, which overseas bidders, if any emerge, could be considered.

The government must ensure public assets are not handed over to asset-strippers, which would lead to criticism similar to that weathered in the Royal Ordnance and Rover affairs, while also making sure, post-privatisation, that the generating industry can keep the lights burning.

Insider trading probe at GTE

AMERICA'S Securities and Exchange Commission, which is looking at possible insider trading in Kay Jewelers after the bid from Ratners, is also, in a parallel investigation, looking at a group of Union Bank of Switzerland traders in Geneva.

GEC Plessey Semiconductors (GPS) has been launched. finally settling the future of the Plessey semiconductor business, which has already undergone one major change of plan since the takeover of Plessev by General Electric Company (GEC), of Britain, and Siemens, of West Germany.

Plessey Semiconductors is now owned entirely by GEC, ownership with Siemens having been dropped this year. Promised from the new entity are faster reactions to market demands, more sales and a better profits performance, all as research and development are increased to meet toughening competition within the EC

Both Plessey and GEC elements are said to be profitable, Plessey being in its ninth consecutive year of profit. The combined business will have an annual turnover of about £200 million and a workforce of 3,900 at Swindon, Plymouth Lincoln and Oldham and, in the United States, at Scotts Valley, California, and Long Island, New Jersey.

ucts including chips, microwave products, silicon-onsapphire devices and products for power generation and distribution.

Military business is now down to about a fifth of GPS turnover. Declining demand in defence-related industries is being played down as an embarrassment because of big expansions foreseen in personal communication systems and satellite communications. Unable to compete in the big volume markets for semicon-ductors, GPS will concentrate on high-technology devices.

Turnover growth of 15 per cent to 20 per cent is expected from GPS relatively soon.

Dr Maurice Dixson, recently brought in from British Aerospace to be supervisory managing director of the GEC said: "We intend to develop and drive forward GEC's microelectronic component activities. The new, enlarged company has first-class facilities, a portfolio of advanced products and a long-range investment programme, supported by GEC, to maintain and improve its existing capabilities and competitiveness."

A key change is in bringing experts in silicon technology based in the research estab lishment at Caswell, Northamptonshire, into a closer working alliance with GEC and Plessey manufacturing operations. About 120 scientists will move from Caswell and be stationed at factories, ready to act as instant troubleshooters as designs are structured for production. However, the workforce at Caswell is likely to remain 450 because of the switching of other projects to it.

No major plant closures or other rationalisations are expected from joining the GEC and Plessey interests, according to Doug Dunn, the GPS

Sand, Glass & Time ---A Creative Fusion, A New Function

The advent of the hourglass in the Middle Ages was the result of combining simple materials creativelyto perform a wholly new function. At Hitachi, we bring together our varied technological resources creatively to develop new products - like the VT-LC50EM, a fusion of electronic, display and materials knowhow that lets people enjoy video and television wherever they are.

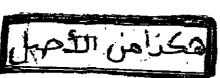

State-of-the-art electronics enabled us to pack full-function video recording and playback with multi-system television reception into a compact, go-anywhere unit.

Industry-leading R&D into liquid crystal technology helped us guarantee long-term performance - each of 115,200 picture elements in the built-in five-inch LCD screen has two back-up transistors.

Combining these elements was no easy task. A special insulator was needed, for example, to prevent electrical noise from interfering with video signals. Our materials engineers developed a special alloy shield to do the job.

The fusion of our advanced skills from electronics and video to materials and supercomputers constantly creates distinctive new products — integrated products with the original functions, reliability and quality that are hallmarks of Hitachi.

They are part and parcel of the core business, which should include active management of the property assets. The profits from the Rover and Royal Ordnance land banks were no chance windfall, for British Aerospace knew precisely what it was buying. On the night the price for Rover was agreed, BAe told analysts of the store of assets it was buying. To suggest that there was an unexpected, "surprise" bonus for a "lucky" purchaser is to insult the business acumen of Professor Roland

could have been a surprise to the industry department, if not to Lord Young, then the responsible minister and a former property developer and trader, who wanted to get the deal done. There is a dreadful lack of interest in commercial property in Whitehall and a consequent lack of expertise. Letters to the Treasury on the subject of commercial property are likely to be misdirected to sections primarily interested in housing. The Treasury's lack of interest is matched only by the similar off-hand attitude of the Bank of England, which takes an interest in the subject only, it seems, when the banks become overextended in a falling market. Yet the value of commercial property in Britain is about twice the level of the entire gilt-edged market, or more than half the value of the entire UK equity market. Neglect is being practised on a grand

Even now, Hanson's property team may be working on a plan to redevelop Bankside power station, just across London's river from St Paul's Cathedral. If so, it is more likely to be for offices than as a theme park rival to Battersea. The possibility of property profits should be a side issue, rather than a central plank in the debate.

The point is that most of the property profits can be foreseen. if not precisely quantified. Better than a clawback would be a realistic assessment of the realisation and development opportunities, which should be built into the price. Sadly, there is probably not enough expertise in Whitehall for that course to be followed, and a clawback arrangement would at least allow the vendors agents to correct their mistakes with the benefit of hindsight mpending publication of the Securities and Investments Board's much simplified second tier rulebook and the recent joint operation of regulators over the British & Commonwealth case has left the City, if not others, satisfied that it has developed the Financial Services Act into a workable system that gives British investors greater protection than their fellows in most other European Community countries. But how long will it last? The worry, a leitmotiv in Stanilas Yassuvich's annual report as chairman of The Securities Association, is that moves to a single European market in financial services bring the prospect of new EC directives that may upset the whole arrangement.

Neither the City nor the government made any attempt to export the sophisticated British system of statute-based supervised self-regulation, partly because they hated the bureaucracy they had created and partly because there seemed no hope of applying it to continental markets dominated by big banks and insurance companies and statutory controls.

London, although a leader in markets, investment products and distribution systems, is left in the accustomed position of trying to water down EC directives to allow Britain to continue in its own sweet way. Thanks to hectic lobbying by Mr Yassukovich and others, this has been successful in the case of EC capital adequacy proposals and, in part, on the Investment Services Directive. But the mismatches brought by compromise over harmonisation will undoubtedly cause trouble and, in the end, either London's open system or continental rules will have to prevail.

A DECADE ago it would have been unthinkable. Gratuitous advice for Mrs Thatcher, an agenda for American prosperity and pointers for Korea all from a business book. The science of competitive strategy has come of age. In 1980 it was aimed at the humble business unit. By 1985 it was sorting out the diversified corporation. In his latest trea-tise, Michael Porter, the Harvard guru, has turned competitive strategy loose on the biggest business of all: the nation states.

The Competitive Advantage of Nations (Macmillan, £25) pulls off the seemingly impossible. It adds a fresh dimension to the international competitiveness debate, which has been going on since Adam Smith and David Ricardo.

Mr Porter begins by pointing out that we have been asking the wrong question. The issue is not why one nation cannot compete with another but rather, why there are concentrations of firms in a particular business.

Why is tiny Switzerland the home base for international leaders in pharmaceuticals and chocolate? Why is Britain the home of the dominant companies in international auctioneering and biscuits? Put that way, what might have looked like the topic of a boring chancellor's speech is transformed into global competitive strategy after all.

Question in hand, Mr Porter goes off in search of clusters of corporate successes in Denmark, West Germany, Italy, Japan, Korea, Singapore, Sweden, Switzerland, Britain and America. Successful exporters and foreign investors are usually found together in local tribes instead of scattered around the globe. Understanding their social habits involves case studies of global company, endowments more than a hundred industries, from food additives in Denmark to pianos in Korea and syringes in the US. Much of the value of the conclusions comes from the leaders in an industry are nationally competitive infound where the raw materi- dustry. als, labour or other inputs required are cheap and abundant. The trouble is, we find the home market drives busithe chocolate leaders in nesses to faster technological more new products, that is just

It turns out that in the age of advanced transport and the competitive bouts are not as of inputs rank way down the list of contributors to national advantage. Another piece of oft-quoted wisdom is that scale economies, arising from a few large players sharing the national fact that they are often coun-ter-intuitive. We all know the market, will promote an inter-tomer sophistication, with the quality of ancillary industries - are boiled down into what Mr Porter christens the "National Diamond". In its virtuous guise, the diamond forms a dynamic spiral of productivity improvement, which contributes to world success for corporation and country. Missing one of its key molecules, however, the diamond is prone to turn to dust.

Now as the jacket blurb informs us, all of this leads to "a blueprint for government policy to enhance national competitive advantage". If one is a Whitehall mandarin or planning on entering Downing Street, it is probably just the ticket. As the manager of a company, national or international, should one be reading it?

The answer is probably in the affirmative. The book offers much for the manager, despite its title. This comes in the "recipe" style, advising on what ingredients to put in and how to combine them, but that is not the same as teaching one how to be a good cook. None the less, most executives will find useful checklists on how to achieve more out of interaction with buyers, ancillary industries, rivals, sources of inputs and governments. The book helps in recognising and then selling the benefits of home, sweet home.

There is also an important warning: sometimes home is not the best place to be. How well will top management at home understand what is required to be world class if their day-to-day interaction is with less sophisticated customers, more passive competitors and poorer suppliers close to headquarters?

To be successful in a global market, one needs to ensure contact with the most dedifficult customers, always manding customers, the toughest rivals and the best suppliers worldwide. More and more companies are thus looking to subsidiaries in Jamost successful international players are those with the most sophisticated and depan or West Germany.

London was last night busy marking down its 1990 yearend forecasts, from £350 million to £335 million pre-tax. Some analysts were chopping £31 million off their original hopes to £324 million. These compare with an actual £283.1 million seen for last year. London was also trimming 1991 forecasts from £423 milion to £405 million.

net cash balances by £74 million to £235.2 million.

The cash increase follows nifty hedging and option moves by the group, and though there will be a net cash outflow in the second half, the year will end with cash holdings in a healthy state.

A generation of new products and services could well give birth to a fresh tide of profit flows in the years ahead, but the tone of yesterday's presentation was of profit hopes deferred.

Fundamentally, the business remains sound, though sensitive, and the day could come when Reuters shares regain their glamour rating.

However, the message that was going round the world last night was that the shares have run ahead of the market by 57 per cent over the past 12 months, and even the downgraded prospective p/e of 20.3 is asking a lot.

Aitken Hume

EVEN though Aitken Hume. an unloved backmarker in the financial services league, has returned to the black, its figures do not inspire confidence. They are still so visions that it remains as difficult as ever to know what is going on.

The profit before tax for the year to end-March was £2.21 million, compared with a loss of £1.37 million in 1989. But this is arrived at only after exceptional losses of £1.66 million, and further tempered below the line by an extraordinary loss of £428,000. Aitken has made extraordinary provisions for five years.

The best news for shareholders is the doubled dividend of 1p, clear evidence of the growing strength of the group's balance sheet. The £14 million sale of Sentinel life insurance business and the £5 million preference share issue in 1988 have left the company cash-positive and earned it

Aitken now has three businesses. British banking, financial services in the Channel Islands and American fund management. All respectably increased profits. Blacks Leisure

BLACKS Leisure went through a corporate workout of exhausting dimensions last year but ended up in worse shape than when it started out.

Only months after launching an unsuccessful bid for A Goldberg, the Glasgow retail group now in receivership, came interim figures which showed a 35 per cent drop in pre-tax profits and a gearing ratio of more than 100 per

Worse was to come. The interim results were overstated and accounting inaccuracies came to light at Miss Sam, one of its largest subsidiaries. The shares did not weather the storms well. They fell from the equivalent of 190p before consolidation to a low of 36p.

Yesterday, the full extent of the horrors was revealed. Results for the year to end-February 1989 have been restated, and profits attribby £167,000. Results for the year to March 3 show pre-tax profits down by 64 per cent to £1.08 million.

The interest payment has doubled to £1.59 million and there is an extraordinary debit of £541,000, mostly due to the costs of the Goldberg bid.

The retained profit for the year is £42,000, against £1.51 million. Earnings per share fell from 12p to 3.83p and there is no final dividend.

Simon Bentley, Blacks' chief executive, is adamant that all the bad news is now out of the way and that the problems have been solved. Gearing remains too high but below the 150 per cent level of the year-end and pre-tax profits for the first three months of the current year are about £900,000.

The shares rose 3p to 45p. Only the brave will consider investing in what was the third worst performing stock of the last decade before there are further signs of recovery.

Jet-lagged after arriving hot-foot from Dubai, Wakeham struggled to stay awake during most of the evening, but was noticeably attentive when Hanson spoke. The PowerGen idea was apparently suggested after that, aithough by which of the two men is not clear.

Less home help

JOHN D Wood, the top people's estate agent, has discovered a novel way of keeping down the cost of selling country properties in these difficult times: by asking clients to advertise their homes themselves. The company yesterday provided a glimmer of hope for other hard-pressed estate agents by announcing annual profits 65 per cent higher at £425,000 before tax. But George Pope and Ian Homersham, the joint chairmen, also unveiled some dramatic changes in working

Warning signs WHEN it comes to spotting

companies in trouble, few know their trade better than Bill Mackey, former doyen of the world of insolvency and author of a definitive guide on the subject. Mackey, aged 65, who was once managing partner of Ernst & Whinney and ran the firm's insolvency division until he retired in 1986, has issued a warning to investors to steer clear of any company report which shows the chairman getting out of a helicopter. "I owned shares in such a company, sold them immediately, and then they plunged in value," says Mackey, who lives in France and admits that he now prefers the quiet life. He drew up his 'test for potential insolvency' eight years ago, and says that it is as appropriate today as ever. A flag

IT IS indeed an ill wind, or tide, that brings no good. The report on pollution of beaches published by the House of Commons environment committee has been a source of cheer in the boardroom at Laporte, the chemicals group. For, in a joint venture with Solvay & Cie, the Belgian chemicals company, Laporte owns Interox Chemicals, and Interox makes an alternative disinfection treatment for sewage - using nothing more ment than vinegar - which. it claims "shows marked and lasting improvements in water quality resulting in compliance with the EC bathing water directive. ful attempt to enter that very same market in the middle of the last decade. It has, however, made fortunes for one or two small operators who have had the imagination to find a hole in the market, and the organisational skills to plug it. The importer that first introduced Becks American lager to the London market, and followed it with a tidal wave of Sol and Dos Esquis from Mexico, was recently the subject of a buyout for a reported £14 million, backed by Security Pacific, although the company admittedly had interests other than beer shipping. In the drinks business, snob appeal is not limited to firstgrowth French clarets. The mainstream lagers, such as

Heineken, were followed into the British market by premium draft brands such as Stella Artois. Another stratum was grafted on further up the market by selling the latter over the pub counter in bottles. Obscure foreign brands occupy an even classier market niche. Their appeal coincides neatly with the growth of the wine bar, all-day cafe and brasserie, and not merely because the patrons of such places are happier paying silly prices than the average drinker propping up the fourale bar. The average wine bar, as an independent business, has no tie to one of the big brewers and no wish, when paying high street rentals, to waste large amounts of storage space on returnable bottles. Freedom from the returnable bottle cycle, which had given the big brewers a strong grip on most lager brands, meant that the produce could be sourced fax machine, started combing the globe for unusual brands, turning up such oddities as Papua New Guinea lager, as well as the Mexican brands then in need of a new home after the collapse of the American market.

The economics of the operation are simple. The element of risk comes because it is not feasible to ship less than a container-load worth tens of thousands of pounds, and all those bottles of premium Patagonian produce must find a buyer prepared to risk them on his customers before the sell-by date.

For a cheaper Mexican brand, the importer probably pays £6.20 for a 20-bottle case. Freight charges are 80p a case, and the EC import tarriff adds another £1.68. British excise duty is another £3.20, giving a cost of nearly £12 a case to the importer. He may be the distributor as well, in which case he needs an effective system of getting small amounts to the bars as they are needed.

The advertising account executive next to you at the bar swilling his bottle of Mexican lager, complete with the obligatory slice of time in the neck, will not balk at paying £2 a bottle, or £40 a case. The bar and the importer/distributor divide the difference. Cheers.

Seoul premier to voice concern at rising trade barriers

Koreans lay siege to fortress Europe

From Peter Guilford in Brussels SOUTH KOREA, deeply suspicious of growing protectionism in the European Community, is stepping up manufac-turing investment in Europe in an effort to evade trade curbs and is mounting its most serious bid yet to ensure that its voice is heard in Brussels.

Seoul maintains that the community's increasingly integrated trade policy is creating a fortress designed to protect Europe's own less competitive businesses. South Korean exporters will be among the first to suffer.

To put forward its point of view, South Korea yesterday dispatched its prime minister, Young Hoon Kang, for talks with EC officials in Brussels. However Mr Young will also come under pressure to remove what Brussels sees as Seoul's own brand of protectionism.

The South Koreans are also planning to invest heavily in Europe to skirt EC trade barriers, just as the Japanese have done. After years of shrugging their shoulders as EC "anti-dumping" penalties were slapped on one cut-price export after another, the South Koreans now believe it is safer to be inside fortress Europe" before the walls grow too high. They will also use the EC as a springboard for Eastern Europe.

Their suspicions will have been confirmed by a decision from Brussels allowing France to block imports of South Korean, Japanese and Chinese television sets from other EC states. The decision will give an extra boost to South Korea's investment plans. Some even see the EC's tough trade stance as a deliberate ploy designed to suck Asian investment into Europe.

So far, the liou's share of that investment has been made in Britain According to the Korea Institute for International Economic Policy, a semiindependent think-tank, half of Korea's EC investment is in Britain. A quarter goes to West Germany and the rest is in Spain, Portugal and France. If Margaret Thatcher, the prime minister, assures the South Koreans, as she has done the Japanese, that they will be welcomed with generous incentives and a promise that she will defend their interests in Europe, far more investment could be on its way.

South Korea's overseas trade association. KOTRA, is actively promoting investment as a way of sidestepping EC protectionism. "Should the EC make it difficult for non-EC members to sell products in its market, South Korean makers will have to set up production centres or subsidiaries to manufacture products within the EC for sale there," it

The electronics firm Samsung - one of South Korea's big four, with Daewoo. Goldstar and Hyundai - now runs a task force to study how and where to invest in Europe.

"We are worned about fair trade and discriminatory standards, but above all we fear that an increase in trade between EC states might damage us," says Pil Gon Rhee, president of Samsung's international division. "Our basic strategy is to become an inside company in the EC."

HARD AT WORK IN DUBLIN 4.

Anyone who is prepared to spend hours in traffic just to be able to sit all day in a city centre office cell, while his car collects parking tickets, has a serious problem. Corporate Chiefs are demanding alternatives. The Corporate Future is Beech Hill.

Its central location is reflected in the two mile drive to Dublin City Centre. Yet, it is beyond the daily congestion which so frustrates city commuters.

Situated overlooking the Dodder with its walkways and parklands, it is also adjacent to the new Riverview Racquet and Fitness Club, an exclusive new leisure centre in which Membership has been reserved for occupiers of Beech Hill Office Campus.

Business takes to working on the water

A waterfront is now the magic ingredient quenching the desire of many companies for an environmentally pleasing workplace

he attractions of living or working by water are growing, even though property by a river or on the coast can cost 20 per cent more than elsewhere. In addition to the imaginative dockland redevelopments in London, Liverpool, Car-diff, Gloucester and so on, canals and rivers are being used much more as sites for development. Even inland developments often have a water feature built into the landscaping.

Recognition of the importance of waterside developments comes with this year's commercial property awards sponsored by the agents Jackson-Stops & Staff and Estates Guzette. Developments fronting rivers, estuaries, canals or docks, and completed since January 1, 1985, will be eligible. Supporting the idea, Chris Patten, the environment secretary, says: One of the most exciting results of the changing patterns of industrial and commercial activity during the 1980s has been a resurgence and renaissance of waterfront development.

"People are rediscovering the pleasure of working close to water. They have been encouraged by the innovative design and good quality of such development throughout the country."

Increasing interest is also indicated by last month's con-ference, "Building by water", organised by The Building Centre. Michael Shields, chief executive of the Trafford Park Development Corporation, outlined the aims of the redevelopment of the docks of Manchester and Salford as:

 Bringing people back into the heart of the conurbation to live and for leisure purposes, in turn bringing trade and income to the local economy.

 Bringing jobs, including con-struction work, to the areas of high unemployment in the inner city. Transforming the image of grimy Manchester and Salford. Helping to put the area on the tourist map, and to make Manchester an international city. Putting confidence back into

These criteria could apply to many other waterside schemes, and they are underpinned by mercial development, with the help of urban development

Developers in Cardiff Bay, for example, have invested more than £250 million in the biggest urban regeneration project in Europe, outside London, with anticipated investment of £2,000 million in the next 10-15 years in the 2,700 acres of derelict dockland.

Geoffrey Inkin, the chairman of the Cardiff Bay Development Corporation, says that confidence, with the creation of the proposed barrage, is running high among

Cambridge style: the £8 million Quayside scheme is the result of a joint venture between Magdalene College and Trafford Park Estates developers and investors. "Interest from developers such as Grosvenor Waterside has demonstrated that the potential is now being realised."

Grosvenor Square Properties Group, represented at Cardiff Bay by Grosvenor Waterside, is the largest UK waterfront developer, partly through its position as part of Associated British Ports Holdings, and has a number of other schemes, including its newly completed Tower Bridge Court on the south bank of the Thames next to Tower Bridge. The 73,000sq ft scheme has a glazed atrium and wall-climber lift, and views of the river and bridge. The agents Healey & Baker and Goodman Mann Associates are quoting rents of about £35 per so ft.

Loudon Docklands, as the buildings rise on the Isle of Dogs, with Canary Wharf at the centre, may resemble a congested build-ing site, but it offers a range of interests for people who work there. The London Docklands Development Corporation says the water sports include sub aqua and wet-biking, and suggests it would not be unreasonable to "nop out of the office at lunchtime and go sailing or windsurling".

To the west, in Battersea, Broadwell's Plantation Wharf is the largest mixed development in the UK outside Docklands, with a proposed 1.6 million sq ft of office, residential and leisure facilities. The first three phases are 500sq ft to more than 100,000sq ft, and the project will be completed towards the end of the century.

In the Midlands, Waterlinks is Birmingham's new mid-town business centre, a £150 million, five-year project to create a 330acre canalside business village in the eastern inner-city area. Developed by a consortium of Bryant, Tarmac, Douglas and Wimpey, it is estimated that rents for offices will be about two-thirds of the £20-plus per sq ft for prime city centre offices. The various buildings offer nearly one million sq fl.

In nearby Dudley, the Richardson twins are building the Waterfront at Merry Hill, part of their plans to regenerate a 300-acre former steelworks site. A £20 million overhead monorail system links the Waterfront with the 1.8 million sq ft shopping centre, which opened last autumn. Rents in the 350,000sq ft of offices are around £12 per sq ft.

Don Richardson, of Richardson Developments, says that the Mid-lands has not seen a major office development of consequence for more than 20 years, and that Waterfront will satisfy some of the demand for quality offices".

The Quayside is an unusual development on the river in Cambridge, on the site of a disused commercial wharf. The new commercial scheme provides the first riverside public spaces on college land in Cambridge, made possible by a joint venture agreement between Magdalene College and the developers Trafford Park Estates, forming Quayside Lim-ited. The £8 million scheme, incorporating a restored Victorian warehouse façade and new buildings, has 36,000sq ft of offices which can be divided into nine self-contained units, a cafe, bar

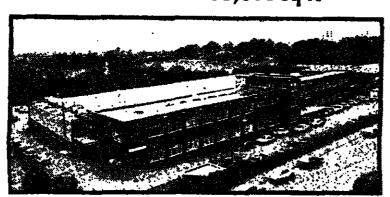

Among the embellishments of the scheme, designed by Nicholas Ray Associates, is a gargovle by Spitting Image of a banker to Elizabeth I who cheated the college of its endowment in 1542. Even in the days of modern, hard

I only in the 100 metres but the see him as somebody I work 200 metres and long jump as out with who is sweating and well; they both come from who gets tired at practice." Pennsylvania, went to the University of Houston, and studied communications. Twenty-four hours before appearing for their events in the Husky Stadium, they were on the same podium at the same church talking about the

But Lewis has been monopolising victories in races between them, winning their first five. At a weekend press conference, Burrell sat behind a name tag introducing him as "Larry Burrell". Missing the world record by only 0.02sec, as he did last year, is simply not enough for some people to take notice.

Now, Burrell cannot be ignored. He beat Lewis for the first time on Monday. confirming what the statistics have been saying for more than a year: that he is the fastest man in the world. Lewis admitted it. "There is no doubt Leroy is the best right now," he said.

Lewis, aged 29, and the world record-holder with 9.92sec, has not given up the contest. "I still have the best race I will ever run left in me. he said. "I feel I am in better shape than ever.'

Much has been made of a prospective race between Lewis and Ben Johnson later this year; with Burrell around, that seems to matter less. Six years ago, he set an ambition to win four events at a college championship after watching Lewis win four gold medals in the Los Angeles Olympics. "I was thrilled at that — he looked so impressive," Burrell

"When I was invited by the surprised if Leroy Burrell and University of Houston to visit and see if I would like to go there, I met Carl. I almost fainted." The idolatry stopped are inseparable most of the and Burrell's confidence grew.

"A lot of people see Carl as They share a coach, a club, a someone who is on TV at the

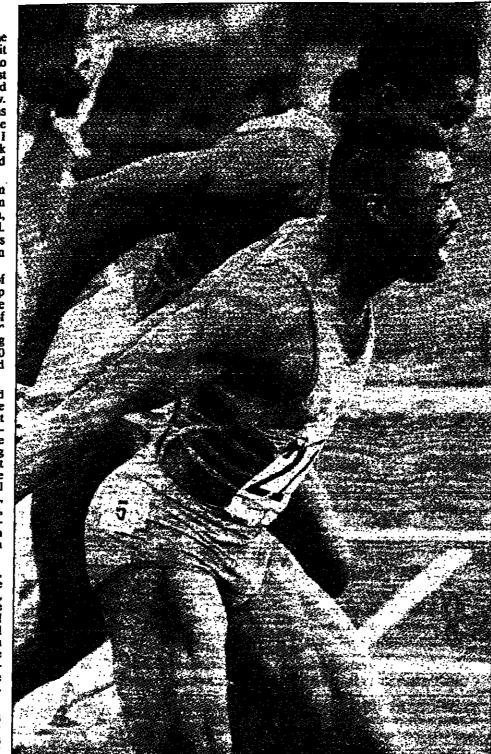

Burrell won here in 10.05sec, with Lewis on 10.08sec. Another American, Mark Witherspoon, was third. "Nobody even noticed I was in the race." Witherspoon

Burrell is no Johnson out of the blocks, but picks up strongly and holds form to the finish. "I didn't get the best of starts, but I accelerated well," he said. "I felt a really strong surge from Carl with about 20 metres to go, but I stayed

A boxing promoter would have a hard time with these two: they keep smiling. Not just through press con-ferences, either. "We were down on the track laughing and joking before the race, yet the Goodwill Games was the first really big international meet I have run in," Burrell, aged 23, said. It was no joke, though, when he started talking about being able to run under 9.9 seconds. "It's an attainable goal," he said.

And to think that Burrell, who had won four consecutive grand prix races in Europe, beating Linford Christie three times out of three, developed as an athlete because he did not have the talent as a baseball player. Or that he might have gone into American football, but had to give up the game because of semiblindness in one eye.

His mind's eye is focusing on four gold medals at the Barcelona Olympics. "It's something I'm shooting for," he said. Anything to be like Lewis.

the Gloucestershire championships, however, the main talking point in the county has been Wally Clifford's blue trousers, which got him thrown out of the pairs championship at the quarter-final stage.
"Out - by the seat of his

Does a county secretary, how-ever, have the right to intervene and overrule a county committee who are in charge of a match, and are quite happy for it to begin? The answer, according to Gloucestershire, is yes.

A Bristol competitor who suggested that Knight would make a good traffic warden might be amused to learn that he is the supervisor of National Car Parks in Gloucester.

the people they are helping. Because of the one-to-one relationship, they get to know the athletes and can monitor their progress."
The inmates allowed to travel to Glasgow have been selected for their character, experience and proximity to the end of their sentence. Nobody is going to risk parole by vanishing into the night when they are only weeks away from release. One prisoner away from release. One presoner due to be let out during the week of the games tried unsuccessfully to have his release date delayed just so that he could go to the Special Olympics.

"For the immates, it is the experience of a lifetime," Brown said. "Probably for the first time, they are working for other people and these people are depending on them. It changes them, they feel they have succeeded." John Elwell found coaching mentally handicapped athletes able. For the last six months, he has been giving swimming les-sons to the pupils of the John Fielding School.

"At first, I was frightened by the thought of prison," he said. "But I've been fortunate, as we have a very progressive governor and the majority of prisoners can get involved in the community. It gives you a great sense of pleasure that you can teach these athletes something. The opportunity is here to give something back which makes the sentence better."
Steve Brown hopes that when the members of his team return to their various prisons, word will spread about the Special Olympics and the volunteer Olympics and the volunteer scheme will grow. With Gareth Richards, from the Prince's Trust, which has financed a large part of the £9,000 trip to Glasgow, Brown is looking to the future and thinking big.

Stressing that the rewards in rugby league are now big enough for a full-time career to be made, the club says that present-day international players like Garry Schofield, David Creasser, David Heron and Roy Powell were faced, on leaving school, with the decision of where best to make their careers. They chose rugby league, and Leeds.
The Leeds initiative demonstrates just how much the 13a-side code has advanced in the past decade. At one time rugby league was regarded as purely a part-time sport, in which players did a day's work in the factory, office, or down the mines, trained for a couple of nights, and then turned out for part-time wages on Saturday or Sunday. Now, particularly at clubs like Wigan and Leeds, players can be given full-time contracts which give them se-cure futures without the need for.

This has brought British rugby league in to line with Australia where for several year, the leading players, like the Australian captain. Wally Lewis, have been able to command huge salaries, which put them in the same bracket as top entertainers. Hornets settle out of court

County Cricket Board (TCCB) regards the England Schools Cricket Association's (ESCA) Bunbury Festival as the most important week for 15-year-olds and under in England is easy to make our. Several of those helped on their way during the 21 years of the festival's existence have taken their places in the pantheon of outstanding cricketers.

Extraordinarily. Botham, the most festival of all cricketers, was not chosen for the representative under-15 side. This only proves that it is not merely England's senior selectors who are fallible. Yet, considering three out of the last five captains of England are among those to have made names for themseives in the annual festival, ESCA's host of beneficient volunteers have clearly got most things right. There is now another objective to the festival, which is taking place this week in the glorious sessing of Oundle School in Northamptonshire. The TCCB has stated its intention that England's best cricketers should be in the Fast side at a younger age than hitherto. Tomorrow. Sznajder's win based on hunger

From MIKE DICKSON IN TORONTO

ANDREW Sznajder, British born but raised in Toronto, brought his adopted home town crowd to its feet yesterday as he fought back to upset the eleventh seed, Kevin Curren, to reach the second round of the Canadian open championship.

Playing baseline tennis, Sznajder, aged 23, recovered from a break down in all three sets to defeat his seasoned opponent 7-5, 6-7, 6-4, in a match that bristled with aggression.

meet in final again

By GEORGE CHESTERTON

The Malvernians visited Regby on Sunday, won the toss and elected to bat. The first wicket fell after lunch at 152.

The Old Cliftonians also chose to bat first on their own ground against Harrow, but went into lunch at 104 for seven. A spirited recovery took their final score to 202 for eight, with Holdsworth and Brown putting on a valuable 81 for the seventh wicker. Stewart had three wickers for 36. PORTSMOUTH (final day of inrec): Hampshire (22 points) beat Derbyshire (8) by 48 runs MALCOLM Marshall has done many fine things in his career, but the way he snatched this game from under the noses of Derbyshire's swaying baismen must rank nigh among them. A speli of seven wickets in 8.3 overs brought his opponents, standing tall on 140 for one in pursuit of 325, swiftly to their knees as the last nine wickets fell for 46 runs. Marshall finished with seven for 47.

Portsmouth week proved a fruitful one for both Hampshire, who picked up 46 points from the two championship matches to move into second place in the table, and Marshall, in the same two games. Marshall scored 120 runs and took 19 wickets for 201. His figures for the season are 659. runs and 41 wickets, and he may not yet be inclined to discount the possibility of the Derbyshire have decided to rest the West Indian fast bowler against Worcestershire, even though they also be without Malcolm, who will be at Lord's with England. Nevertheless, they can still field four pace bowlers and include the powerful Kuiper, of South Africa. Morris's replacement is the very promising O'Gorman.

Kent are hoping Benson will have recovered from a thumb injury to play against the championship leaders. Middlesex, in the first match of the Canterbury festival week, Benson is needed not only for his batting but also as captain in place of the injured Chris Cowdrey. Gooch century realises hundred of the summer, enabled Essex to complete a remarkable victory in glorious sunshine yesterday. A stiff target — 348 to win in $4 overs — looked out of reach before Gooch's punishing strokeplay made nonsense of all mathematical calculations. A large crowd, who saw 499

runs in the day, revelled in the unexpectedly rousing finish to a good match as Essex won with six balls to spare and dented Lancashire's championship

Most of Gooch's 21 fours were driven and pulled with imperious power and he swept the spinners mercilessly, including several reverse strokes against Hughes. He had faced 152 balls before he was legbefore to Atherton when Essex needed 17 from five overs.
Gooch and Stephenson laid a splendid foundation with 158 runs in 27 overs before Stephenson skied a catch to wide midon. Shahid was involved in several run out scares as he shared a somewhat frenetic tury from 89 balls. Shahid eventually failed to beat DeFreitas's throw as he sought a second run from a bye. Waugh arrived to give Gooch

the mature support required and their stand of 118 in 15 overs had virtually clinched the match when Gooch was out. Waugh, who hit 58 from 52 balls, was caught at short extra cover. Atherton and Fairbrother, who came together on Monday evening, made chanceless centuries as they shared an unbroken stand of 220 in 62 overs. By the time Lancashire declared, though, 30 minutes after lunch, the crowd were slow hand-clapping. At that stage it was hard to disagree that Hughes had been tardy. With the pitch having lost its liveliness, and on a fast outlield, he presumably always scared that his bowlers might get a pasting. He also knew that Wasim Akram was fourth century of the summer

Hester ask al of the Loosemore competent at the start From BARRY WOOD GREAT Britain took an ex-pected 2-0 lead over the Dominican Republic in the first round of the Federation Cup in Atlanta yesterday, with victories by Monique Javer and Sarah Loosemore. However, though both performances were competent, they were not without their blemishes.

Javer, playing at No. 2, beat the unranked Joelle Schad, 6-2, 6-3, while Loosemore overcame Madeline Sanchez, ranked at No. 564 in the world, 6-2, 6-1. Javer gave perhaps the more solid performance against a player who, with little doubt, played far above her usual level. He is delighted that women have been imitted to the pavilion at Old Trafford but does not forecast this occurring at Lord's. "I do not see this happening in this century if not the next" he said. Football will once again pro-ide the sports minister with the

Atkins is clearly an experi-enced junior minister and private secretary, having served in several ministries such as transport, industry and employment. In style, looks and approach he is very similar to Sir Neil MacFarlane, the former sports minister although probably Alkins possesses greater par-liamentary skills. He plans to spend a lot of time "listening" to the representatives of British sport. They will have a lot to tell him and he has certainly a lot to

Reservations over Moynihan tenure

COLIN Moynihan has inspired widely varied opinions about his performance in his three years as minister for sport. Certainly Robert Atkins, his successor, will find it difficult to emulate Moynihan's workrate and commitment. Sir Arthur Gold, the chairman of the British Olympic Association praised Moynihan's "energy and enthusiasm". "He brought to the office a degree of expertise and a gut feeling for sport." Sir Arthur also admired the campaigning of Moynihan on drug abuse in sport, a crusade that the pair shared.

However, Sir Arthur said that Moynihan perhaps underesti-mated the talent in sporting administration. "Colin occa-sionally assumed that a talented young competitor necessarily had more expert knowledge of the sport than even an experi-enced official."

Sir Arthur would like to see should not pay tax on their teacher training colleges for profits. "Instead of profits one physical education following the should call it 'income over collapse of extra-curricular expenditure' because sports activity in many schools. expenditure because sports bodies are not profit making organisations. Player believes Faldo will rank with greatest players

By MITCHELL PLATTS GOLF CORRESPONDENT

GARY Player, the South African golfer who has won nine major championships and who was one of the big four of the game in the Sixties and Seventies, believes that the Open champion, Nick Faldo, will earn a place in history alongside the likes of Gene Sarazen, Ben Hogan, Jack Nicklaus and himself.

Yesterday, he took time off from his preparations for the Volvo British Seniors Open, which begins at Turnberry tomorrow, to explain why he believes Faldo will be considered among the greatest players the game has ever seen.

"My prediction is that Nick will be the next man to have the grand slam of all four major championships," he said. "It is possible to do it in one year, but highly unlikely. What I like most about Nick is his golfing brain. ! like his course management. When you watch him playing, you can see he stands out in that department.

"Nick Faldo is very close to being in my top ten. He is certainly the man who is dominating major championships today. It gives me a great kick, too, because I love Britain, and it's tremendous that they have produced a great champion like Nick. I'm really tickled about it. I got really excited about Tony Jacklin. Now you have Nick. Everyone should be proud of him. I don't see how anyone can criticise him. Because he happens to be serious on a golf course? Because he's not a joker like Chi Chi Rodriguez? How many majors did

"I've watched Lee Trevino and he was as serious as a hawk, then at the right times he would crack his jokes. But when he was within 50 yards of that ball, he was like a hawk. I've read things over here on

Nick and I can tell you it is plain jealousy. They should all be proud and hailing him. No players should criticise him. I had it all in my life and so did Nicklaus and so did

"But I have never seen anyone yet in whom I haven't seen something in which they could improve, If I was Nick, I wouldn't play any exhibitions. I would spend all my time playing golf and building my body to super-

"You can say Nick is big, and, yes, he is big, and that he hits the ball 280 yards. But he could hit it 300. You see, these are the things he must work on. He doesn't have to worry about making money. I was a poor boy. I made £30 a month for three years. I had to go out and play exhibitions. For me to go to my first Masters, my club in Johannesburg collected £125 to send me and my father got an overdraft to buy me a set of clubs. I beginning to the end. and I can tell had ties instead of belts to hold my you, it is a pressure which it is hard trousers up when I first came to Britain in 1955. You see, we've played golf at different times.

"The best record in golf is Jack Nicklaus's. The best golfer I ever saw is Sam Snead. He had the best swing. He won in his twenties, in his thirties, in his forties, in his fifties, in his sixties and he almost won a tournament in his seventies. Now that is a Rolls-Royce engine.

Ben Hogan, Jack Nicklaus, Arnold Palmer, Lee Trevino, Seve Ballesteros and Bobby Locke would be in that top ten and Nick Faldo is now well on his way to joining them. He is still a young man. He must have longevity.

"I've got the utmost admiration for the way Nick won the Open from the front. I've been in the arena he was in last Sunday when I won at Royal Lytham and St Annes in 1974. I led there from the very

to live with.

There are several golfers who have been able to lead and win. But not many. Arnold Palmer, Jack Nicklaus, Lee Trevino, Ben Hogan - those are the guys that come to my mind that were able to do that.

I watched on television as Nick played the third round. It is the frame of mind which makes a man a champion and you could see that he would not lose the championship.

"There can be no comparison between Nick and other British golfers during the time I have been playing. This man has won the Masters twice. He has now won the Open twice.

"I can't compare Nick with players that I did not see - like Henry Cotton. For instance, I keep reading about how difficult it is to win championships now, but it has always been that way. Do you think it was easy for Henry Cotton? When Cotton was playing he was playing with hickory-shafted clubs. inferior equipment, inferior golf courses, he was not accepted in clubhouses as a pro and there was no money around as there is today. And look at the scores that the man did with hickory shafts, poor equipment and lousy conditioned golf courses. It's astonishing.

"Now what would have happened if you had taken him and given him the modern equipment. a million dollars in prize-money every week, no dud golf balls and be able to fly by Concorde to America? If you pur Corten or Nicklaus, Palmer or Hogan, in today's field then they would win just as much as they did win. If you've got it, you're a champion and you win in any era. You rise to the occasion. Nick Faldo is the one who is rising to the occasion now."

Glamorgan close to achieving impossible target

CRICKET CORRESPONDENT

ABERGAVENNY (final day of three): Glamorgan (5pts) drew with Worcestershire (6) COUNTY cricket has seen iew more remarkable games than this. Glamorgan, asked to score a mind-boggling 495 in 88 overs to beat Worcestershire, fell only two runs short at the end of the day which increased the match aggregate to 1,641 runs, a record for a three-day championship

There were seven individual centuries, more than a thousand runs in boundaries and only 16 wickets fell. But while this match is consigned to the file of rare and exotic memories. Graeme Hick's latest deed will live in the record

His second century of the game was the fastest in the championship this season. It was also the fiftieth of his youthful first-class career, a milestone he has achieved vounger than anyone in history and second only to Bradman in terms of innings dred came with a six over so has made a century every fifth time he has gone to the middle. Bradman's figure was 50 centuries from 175 innings but no one else is close to Hick. At a time when some were beginning to question his durability. he has now amassed 592 runs in two championship games without being cut once.

He batted, yesterday, for only 35 minutes but it was enough for him to add 52 to when Maharashtra scored 604 his overnight score. His hun-mid-wicket from the 71st ball he received, beating by two balls Viv Richards's existing fastest century.

A more adventurous man than Neale would surely have set a maximum of 450 and avoided the unedifying use of lob bowling to manipulate the finish. His deadpan demand for 495 was asking something which has been achieved only a handful of times in the game's history including one in a run chase, only 355 short

Neale would doubtless point out that Glamorgan chose to bat last. Conversely, Worcestershire had dictated the game and, as champions with a title to protect, they surely had to take some sort of gamble. Neale not only declined but set a third man and fine leg from the outset.

The sunbathing crowd.
swelled by market day to a healthy 3,000, did not seem to mind. After Curtis and Hick, bring on Butcher and Morris for more of the same. The Glamorgan openers obliged efficiently. Their stand of 256 was put together with poise and purpose. There were times, especially after lunch, when it almost seemed they had deemed victory impossible but they knew their business well. When they were divided it was the first wicket to fall for five hours and 431

The plan was to get through to tea with them still together and this was achieved. Both men, by then, were passed 100 and neither had given a chance. For Butcher, it was also the completion of 20,000 first-class runs; at the age of 36, he is playing the best cricket of his life.

The need for 266 in 34 overs after tea did not deter Glamorgan. Even the loss of four wickets for 32, three of them to Newport in 16 balls, failed to do so, for they still had Richards in residence.

The Richards factor must always have been in Neale's mind and, while he lasted, it was wonderful stuff - 43 from balls, including two astonishing sixes. But, when Illingworth deceived him, in the last over before the final hour, stalemate seemed Neale's antidote was to offer six overs of tripe from Curtis and D'Oliveira, aided by some deliberately casual fielding. Cowley and Croft helped themselves to 69 runs and now needed 100 from 14 Against proper bowling, the target dipped to 78 off 10, 43 off five and then 15 from the last, bowled by Illingworth. Croft, a jauntily assured 20year-old, kept hope of the improbable alive with a six but needing three from the last ball, managed only a leg-

Fifa committed to the United States venture

RIO DE JANEIRO (Reuter) -João Havelange, the president of Fifa, football's governing body, said on Monday that the United States would stage the 1994 World Cup finals, dismissing reports that the Americans were prepared to back down. Havelange said: "It has been confirmed since May 1988."

The failure of the 1990 World Cup to gain the interest of American television viewers aroused speculation that the United States would not stage the 1994 finals.

Paul Breitner, a member of West Germany's 1974 World
Cup-winning team, said in a newspaper column that he had been told by a member of the United States organising committee that a decision to step down had already been made.

Havelange said Europe would have only 12 guaranteed places in the 1994 World Cup. Europe supplied 14 of the 1990 finalists, including the hosts, Italy.
Havelange did not make clear whether the new figure included the defending champions, West Germany, who gain automatic entry to the finals.

Havelagne said Asia would have two finalists, South three CONCACAF, North and Central America, two, but did not say whether the United States say whether the United States Cup opponents, on August 10. were included in the John Sillett, the Coventry CONCACAF quota. He did not mention Africa, who are pressing for an increase in their representation from two teams to three after the noteworthy performances by Cameroon and Egypt in Italy.

Another place would be disputed between Europe and Asia, and a further place would be contested by South America and CONCACAF, he Havelange said new methods for deciding drawn matches in the World Cup, to replace the penalty shoot-out, would be discussed by Fifa at the end of the year. Fifa's World Cup organising com-mittee, which has 21 member countries from five continents, would meet in December, discuss a report of the 1990 competition and then put forward any new proposals at a later meeting, he

Loss of All Blacks increases pressure

AUCKLAND (AFP) - New Zealand are committed to important changes in the rules governing amateurism in after rugby league scouts plunrugby union, the chairman of the New Zealand Rugby Football Union, Eddie Tonks, said yesterday.

He said the union had invited Sir Ewart Bell. the chairman of the International Rugby Football Board's (IRFB) committee on amateurism, to hear the New Zealand viewpoint first-hand.

New Zealand have always been in the vanguard of moves towards relaxing amateur rules, but the issue has taken on a renewed urgency here dered a number of New Zealand All Blacks earlier this season.

'We are committed to making major changes." Tonks said. "We've asked Sir Ewart out here so he gets an understanding why and where we stand on this."

He said New Zealand will meet the Australian Rugby Union to co-ordinate a joint approach on the issue at the IRFB meeting in October.

107,000, the lowest figure since India toured in 1982. Although it is possible to cite extenuating circumstances - apart from rain seriously hampering the matches at Trent Bridge and Lord's, the series had to contend with the rival attractions of football's World Cup finals - the figures continue a downward trend in gates at Tests in this country.

Even before this season, there was ample evidence of a decline. From 1980 to 1989, each of the six visiting Test-playing nations experienced a fall in attendances in relation to the tours of England they had made between 1982 and 1985. The highest average English Test gate of recent times (over 63,000) was recorded during the Ashes series of 1981, which, through the inspired deeds of Ian Botham, had demonstrated the virtuosity of the five-day game.

The average attendance during the 1982-85 period was 51,778; during 1986-89 it was 49,583, a fall of over four per cent. Some, including the Test and County Cricket Board (TCCB), are inclined to see a correlation between these figures and the performances of the England team.

Terence Blake, the board's marketing manager, said: "I don't think it's an irreversible trend. If Graeme Hick is a prodigy and we get another Ian Botham into the team, things could increase again. It must be related to the fact that England have been losing in the last few years. A winning team is always going to get more people."

Blake said: "In a fast food society people must weigh up their position according to the options they have. The TCCB has often considered the balance between the five-day game and the one-day game and it will continue to study it."

Most indicative of the modern malaise perhaps, is Pakistan's approach to the problem. Rather than issue instructions for Test pitches to be prepared which might produce results, the Pakistan board is channelling its energy into staging later this year a one-day tournament, the Bhutto Cup, which entirely adopts the format of Australia's successful World Series Cup, right down to the floodlights that are being installed at Karachi and Lahore.

Away from these powerful lights, in the dark corner into which it has been cast. Test cricket is beginning to wither and die. Few administrators seem to have the power, or some the inclination, to save it.
